International fee repealed

By MICHELLE RIVERA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite threats of immediate termination from University of Massachusetts, graduate student Yasser A. Munif refused to pay a $65 international student fee that was enforced on all international students last semester.

If the mandatory fee was left unpaid, Munif would have been withdrawn from the University, and faced with possible deportation from the country. But still Munif, along with an estimated 100 other international students at UMass, refused to pay the fee because they felt it was unwarranted and discriminatory to foreign students.

"It was a concern for everyone and we were ready to risk that," Munif said about the consequences of not paying the fee. "We were very supportive of each other."

The fee was introduced by UMass officials last December, and since taking effect this past spring semester, the Amherst campus has been the site of several staged protests, rallies, hunger strikes and marches led by both international and domestic students. For Munif and the rest of the 100 international students, holding off on paying the required fee seems to have paid off.

After a nine-month battle, UMass has agreed to comply with the decision of a local arbitrator and abolish the fee after it was deemed that the mandatory fee targeting international students was discriminatory.

MATTHEW B. BROWN/COLLEGIAN

Graduate Employee Organization Labor Educator Craig Sinclair, Treasurer Yasser Munif, and member Jed Murr opposed the New International Student fee.

The decision to revoke the fee came just a few weeks before the start of the fall semester. In addition, the local arbitrator from the American Arbitration Association ruled a full reimbursement by the University to the international students who already paid the fee.

Shortly after the decision, UMass announced its decision not to appeal the arbitrator's ruling. "While we disagree with the conclusion reached by the arbitrator, we respect the process of arbitration and will comply with the arbitrator's decision," Chancellor V. Lombardi said in a prepared statement.

"As a matter of fairness, we also decided that we should take an additional step and end the fee for all international students," Lombardi added.

Until the fee was revoked, students refusing to pay the fee were unable to register for fall classes. "I personally was worried the University would appeal the decision," said Jennifer D. Turner, a graduate student and the president of the Graduate Employee Organization, the organization that would have been affected by the fee. "We've had a lot of national coverage over the fee in the last six to nine

Southwest receives $230,000 worth of new security video cameras

By ERIKA LOVLEY

University of Massachusetts Southwest residential area has approximately $230,000 worth of new video cameras that are being installed as part of a $5 million capital improvement and residential security effort, according to Director of Housing Michael Gilbert. The sum covers all camera equipment and installation.

130 to 132 cameras will be fully operating in all Southwest residential halls as well as Baker Hall and Van Meter in Central by September. Most of the cameras were installed over the summer break, and there will soon be cameras in all 41 residence halls on campus. According to a Housing Services report, an additional $175,000 from the annual capital funding for security systems is expected to pay for the purchase and installation of cameras into 10-15 additional buildings over the next two years.

"The cameras are being seen as a security tool," said Gilbert. "Supervising is an important point with security."

"[The cameras] are a product of our desire to provide a safer community and environment for our student, faculty, staff, and visitors to campus," said

Hundreds of students forced to live in lounges

The "summer melt" of students withdrawing from the University of Massachusetts was not as large as anticipated, forcing approximately 480 students to make their homes in residence hall lounges and local hotels until more dorm rooms free up.

The "summer melt", a period when students steadily cancel their housing subscriptions did take place, but Housing Services is still tracking 11,400 students registered for on-campus housing, according to Michael Gilbert, director of housing services.

"It's a really good sign," said Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life. "[UMass] has a growing number of students who are selecting this university as their top choice and are happy to be here."

Gilbert says that for the last two years, UMass has been accepting a bigger core population than it can accommodate. Also, for the last four years, more juniors and seniors have chose to remain in the dorms, despite rising housing costs. This semester, a standard double room costs $1,614. A corner double in a Southwest tower or Sylvan double costs slightly less—$1,568—due to their smaller size.

"When we open we will still be oversubscribed," said Gilbert.

Over 360 students will be living in lounges and about 120 additional students will be housed in hotels, such as the University Lodge on North Pleasant Street and the Lincoln Campus Center Hotel.

Gilbert says that on opening week,

Fire injures 3 near Gorman Hall $100,000 in damages estimated

A 45-year-old man and two firefighters were injured in a fire that caused an estimated $100,000 in damages to an Amherst house directly across from Gorman Hall on the University of Massachusetts campus Tuesday, August 31.

Resident David Sharpe was found sitting dazed on the stairwell leading to the second floor by firefighters who first entered the building.

"He told me he had been working on his computer," said Amherst Fire Department Chief Keith Hoyle, according to the Hampshire Gazette.

Sharpe carried across the street and treated for smoke inhalation and burns at the scene and transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by Fire Department ambulance. Sharpe's condition was not available at press time.

Capt. Brian Sterling and firefighter Nate Merritt were also transported to the hospital after Sterling complained of exhaustion and Merritt sustained a leg injury from falling through a floor. Both were treated and released.

The Amherst Fire Department responded to the call at 10:34 a.m. by a UMass maintenance worker who observed heavy smoke from 87 Butterfield Terrace.

"I pulled out of Southwest and saw a big plume of smoke," said Alan McPhee, a member of the Rockland, Mass. Fire Department and a former UMass student volunteer firefighter.

McPhee was on campus photographing the new UMass volunteer firefighters training week, known as "Wonder Week". McPhee says the week includes over 120 hours of intensive training, such as putting out mock car fires, hauling ropes up the walls of the parking garage, and practicing climbing ladders 20 stories in the air around Washington Tower in Southwest.

McPhee said the volunteers were in the middle of a training drill when AFD received the call for the fire. The returning volunteers who were participating in Wonder Week training were able to respond to the fire, while the new participants clustered near Gorman Hall to watch.

By 10:55 a.m., a crowd of UMass employees and students also gathered to watch the responding 41 firefighters and three chiefs help secure the area by cutting down tree branches and breaking windows to let in air.

The blaze was extinguished by two firefighters using the department's aerial ladder and running several hoses through the front door.

Amherst Animal Control officials removed three pet turtles and a snake from the house, which is co-owned by Eugene Shirley Sharpe and David Sharpe. University police helped with traffic control.

The origin and cause of the fire was still under investigation by the State Fire Marshal's Office and Amherst Fire Investigators and police at press time and was deemed uninhabitable by the town building inspector.

NEW YORK (AP) —President Bush sought to take the edge off a conservative image sharpened by three years of war and aggressive tax cuts, casting himself as a steady and compassionate leader who would use a second term to build a more hopeful America.

Bush asked voters Thursday night to reject John Kerry's "policies of the past."

New website gives UMass a look at some fresh faces

By Michelle Dozois
Collegian Staff

UMass student and facebook member Byron Wallace, 20, surfs the UMass facebook website at his job in the Computer Science Building.

This fall, students at the University of Massachusetts will have two new ways to meet, chat or flirt with other students on campus— without having to leave their dorm rooms.

UMassfacebook.com and TheFacebook.com are online services that allow students to post their name, personal interests, and photograph in an online directory and membership is free.

Umassfacebook.com is only open to UMass students but TheFacebook.com, a similar, more widespread website linking students at over 50 schools in the nation, will be available to UMass students by the end of September, according to Thefacebook.com spokesperson Chris Hughes.

"It was fun looking for my friends for the first couple of days, but after that it lost its novelty," said Leonardi, 21. "Now I just use it to look at pictures of hot girls."

Simmie Berman, a junior at Cornell and a member of Thefacebook, said there are both pros and cons to using the site.

"It's bad, because people become stalker-like," she said, "But good because you can point out the random people you don't remember from class."

Both sites allow members to upload photographs and list a variety of personal information, including AOL Instant Messenger screen names, cellular phone numbers, interests and relationship status. Members can also link to their friends, and even see a list of their friends' friends—features similar to those on social networking site Friendster.com.

UMass junior Byron Wallace feels a bit skeptical about the face book; however, he is still a registered user.

"It's slightly less desperate than Internet dating," Wallace said.

Although the site is not registered as an official UMass website and it is run anonymously, it is however, operated for students and by students.

UMass senior Chris Littlefield admits that the idea of a face book on campus is beneficial, however he has not chatted with too many people yet.

"I think [UMass face book] is a good outlet for people who are new to the campus and haven't had a chance to meet very many people yet," said Littlefield. "But I haven't taken the time to really check it out much myself, aside from the friend invitations I have gotten."

"I like the network part," said Molly Morse, 20, a UMass senior. "You can see people that you see in class, and see that they're friends with one of your friends. It's always easier [to meet people] when there are friends involved, and it doesn't have to be a one-on-one situation."

Harvard senior Marisa Puccini described the overall attitude toward website Thefacebook.com as initially very favorable at Harvard, when Harvard junior Mark Zuckerberg launched the site in February.

"At first, everyone was changing their pictures and updating their profiles," Puccini said.

About a month later, logging on to the facebook became taboo, she said.

"People got sick of it," Puccini said. "There was a facebook backlash...People still went on, but they just didn't talk about it anymore. I still like it."

At first, Thefacebook.com was only open to Harvard students. Less than a month after its inception, Zuckerberg and his facebook team added Columbia, Stanford, Yale, Cornell and Dartmouth to the site, allowing users at those schools to log on.

Some questioned their choice of linked schools.

"[People asked] 'Why are you guys so elitist?'" Hughes said. "It's nothing to do with that."

Because of the social networking nature of the site, Hughes said, it was necessary to add schools that Harvard students, presumably, had friends at.

"Most Harvard students know at least one person at Yale or Columbia," he said.

Now, Hughes says that Thefacebook.com operators are adding colleges by request.

"We give preference to schools who've given us emails asking us to add them to the network," Hughes said.

At the beginning of September, the facebook was available to students at 58 colleges and universities across the United States. Hughes said that they plan to add 200 more schools to the facebook by the end of September, and that UMass was among the top 25 on that list of schools.

Users of the facebook can only view the profiles of students from their own schools, however they are permitted to search through the names of students at other colleges on the facebook. Students can request to view another student's profile and that student has to option to accept or decline the request.

Hameer Thattie, 21, a UMass senior who is a member of UMass facebook, said that he will use Thefacebook.com once it is available to UMass students.

"That'll make it easier to network with other schools," he said.

Berman said she's used the facebook to reconnect with a former classmate.

"You can talk to people you otherwise wouldn't probably have heard from again," she said. "I hadn't talked to [a high school friend] in a really long time, but he's on the facebook, and I sent him a message, and we've chatted a bit."

UmassFacebook.com declined to answer any emailed requests by the Collegian.

Karam appointed to chair UMass Board of Trustees

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

James Karam is a native of Tiverton, Rhode Island.

Real Estate developer James Karam will be residing as the new chairman of the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees, after being appointed by Governor Mitt Romney to replace former chair Grace Fey.

Karam, a Tiverton R.I. native, has been a member of the board of trustees and was recently selected by the governor to replace Fey, who was appointed by Governor William Weld in 2000.

According to the Associated Press, Grace Fey, the former chair who stepped down, urged Governor Romney to replace her with Republican trustee member Karl White. But as for any tension or controversy, Karam said there is none.

"She is a woman of tremendous talent," Karam said about Fey, " I admire her and I look forward to her serving as a mentor to me."

As chairman of the board, Karam has several goals for the universities.

"We work hand in hand with the president and the five chancellors to determine our overall goals," he said. "Our job is to benchmark and set the standards for the president and the chancellors and to monitor those performances in terms of quality, student life, accessibility, affordability."

Karam, who recently met with President Jack D. Wilson to discuss the future of the UMass system, agreed that there needs to be more support from the commonwealth to assist in University funding.

"Years ago, 40 percent of the revenue came from the commonwealth," he said. "Last year, it dropped to 18 or 19 percent, so we need alternative sources of revenue so that we are managing and maximizing the income with summer programs and continuing education."

Karam said that one of the newest ideas to generate revenue is the idea of a lifetime of learning. He said that education and learning used to stop after the twelfth grade, or end after college.

Today, people of all ages can participate in endless learning, with new UMass programs such certificate programs and refresher courses.

Karam said that because the Amherst campus is the flagship campus, it needs to set the standard for the other four campuses; UMass Lowell, UMass Dartmouth, UMass medical, and UMass Boston.

"Amherst is the flagship school and we need to emphasize the quality and the reputation of Amherst and to bring the other campuses to that level," he said. "Don't let the other campuses bring down Amherst."

Karam said that there is not one campus that is stranger than the other but rather they are all so geographically different and that they are all growing at different levels.

The chairman has also been busy raising money for the John Kerry campaign. A personal friend of the candidate's and a long time democrat, Karam believes that Kerry stands for what is important in higher education.

"He has a clear understanding of what higher education means to this country," he said.

The Governor replaced three members of the board last year and three more have since been appointed. By the end of the Governor's term, he will have appointed most of the board.

Karam hopes that any new appointee will be from the western part of the state to better serve the Amherst community. As far as any controversy surrounding the Governor's appointees, Karam again, said there is none and that Romney has done a fair job appointing.

"All he [Mitt Romney] asked them was if they had the time and the ability to serve, he didn't even know their party affiliation."

SGA surprised by new cameras

doors, perimeter doors, reception desks and primary entrance doors. There are no cameras pointing at bathroom doors or student rooms.

"We do not envision that at this point," said Gilbert. "We are monitoring public areas and not residents."

For some students, the camera installation has come as a bit of a shock. Brian Long, Student Government Association secretary of university policy, says that he was never informed that the cameras were being put in place, which was information that he feels the SGA should have been privy to.

"Anything that Housing Services is budgeted for is out of [funds] paid for by students," Long said. "The SGA should've known. There should have been student input."

"In my mind, [the cameras] aren't even preventative, because students don't even know they are there," said SGA President Eduardo Bustamante.

The cameras were paid for by funds from Housing Services that are comprised of student housing fees. The project is designed over the period of two years so the Housing Fee will not increase for students.

Long says he became aware that the administration was planning to install cameras when student David Synnott, a senior, discovered a bidding website under the UMass Housing Services homepage in mid-June. The site was complete with pictures of locations where the cameras were to be installed, as well as the angles and areas each camera would monitor.

Gilbert believes the site was developed by Jim Meade, coordinator of the student security program in order to find bids from different vendors for the camera installation.

Long, Bustamante, and SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins sent an email to Gilbert "just giving him a heads up that we knew," said Long. A week later, the website disappeared.

"The pictures on the [original website] showed cameras in intrusive places, pointing toward bathrooms," said Bustamante. "It was a little bit of a surprise."

However, Bustamante says the way the cameras are currently set up is much less intrusive than what he saw on the original website plan.

The three members of the SGA did meet with both Gilbert and Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano over the summer to discuss the cameras.

"When we did meet with [Gilbert] he was very upfront with us about the camera costs," said Long.

According to Bustamante, the idea of cameras may have been discussed between the members of the SGA and the senior administrative staff last fall in meetings in reaction to the on-campus riots and disturbances that took place after the Red Sox's win over Oakland in the American League Division Series and loss to the Yankees in the American League Championship Series.

"I did raise the question of cameras in the context of providing a safer environment for all the users of our campus," said Gargano.

However, David Carr, last year's SGA president, said that to his knowledge, Gargano never presented the issue of cameras to him or last year's Speaker Jared Nukes.

"Neither of us would ever approve cameras," said Carr. "I think it's a dangerous step to be taking when we don't have any information that the program actually works."

Carr said that if the idea had been presented to the SGA, "we could have brought it to the eyes of the students a bit more."

A recently installed camera in a Southwest lobby.

"You like to get as much student input as you can. The SGA can certainly recommend what they think is appropriate," said Gargano. "[But] they don't have to deal with the incidents [of student destruction] in the manner my staff has to. They don't have to speak to parents."

Gargano says that while the cameras will not deter 100 percent of poor student behavior, the cameras will act as a deterrent.

"It's without question that the cameras will deter a certain level of campus endangering activities," said Gargano.

He hopes the cameras will be useful to record and identify individuals involved in destructive or dangerous behavior when incidents occur. He believes that the cameras will not only identify UMass students, but also the non-UMass students who cause destruction on campus.

"If you could chart the activity that could border on criminal-type activity, it is [mostly] being done by non-UMass students," said proposals, including steps to tighten high-school testing, encourage investment in poor communities, force deficit-reduction and expand health care.

The thousands of Republican faithful in Madison Square Garden exploded in cheers of "Four more years! Four more years!" Bush basked in the adoration, but his words were aimed at a television audience of millions in a presidential race deadlocked two months before Election Day.

He spoke from a stage laden with imagery meant to remind viewers he is already their commander in chief. Bush stood on a circular floor emblazoned with the presidential seal, and the backdrop featured large flags and white columns reminiscent of the White House.

Protesters disrupted the 62-minute speech twice. Bush was forced to stop speaking both times because the crowd shouted both women down, drowning him out too.

Bush's criticism of Kerry was measured; he let his vice president and allies batter the Democrat all week. The president calmly ticked off a litany of differences between Kerry and himself, on Medicare reform, health care, education reforms, child tax credits, and the marriage penalty.

"You face a choice," the president said. "My opponent's policies are dramatically different from ours." He said Kerry has proposed more than $2 trillion in new spending" and that's a lot, even for a senator from Massachusetts."

Laura Bush applauds her husband as he accepts the nomination for his second term.

"His policies of tax and spend of expanding government rather than expanding opportunity are the policies of the past," Bush said.

The president placed the Sept. 11 attacks that scarred this city front and center in his speech, just as he has throughout his campaign. Bush's approval ratings surged past 90 percent after the attacks, but were dragged down by the Iraq war and divisive policies and the loss of millions of jobs.

The result: a nation as divided as it was in November 2000, when Bush won a bitterly contested victory.

Bush did not shrink from invoking the terrorist attacks, which marked the crowning moment

Dozens of students without rooms

at least 100 to 150 students will never materialize, freeing up space. Many students also find off-campus housing and never inform the University of their living arrangement change.

Temporary lounge rooms are set up to accommodate three to four students, depending on location and room size. They are furnished almost exactly like traditional dorm rooms. All students who stay in temporary housing get a 10 percent discount on their housing fee.

"We recognize that it's a different type of housing than what students were expecting, and we make adjustments," said Gilbert.

Other adjustments have been made to better accommodate students' needs. In the past, the University has rented rooms in Howard Johnsons on Russel Street in Hadley. However, it proved to be too much of a hassle for students traveling back and forth between classes, the library and coordinating meals at on-campus dining facilities.

"It was too big of an undertaking," said Gilbert.

Students staying in hotels are assured that their status is temporary, and have first priority to be reassigned into residence halls. "We have always been able to relocate students from hotels by the end of the first week of classes," said Gilbert.

Amherst Police receive grant for DUI campaign

"You drink. You drive. You lose."

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

You Drink and Drive. You lose. This is the caution of the Amherst Police Department and the title of the Massachusetts Governor's Highway Safety Bureau campaign to end drunk driving that APD is implementing over the next week.

The APD has received a $9,000 grant from the GHSB to fund the enforcement of drunk driving laws from August 27 to September 12. The focus will be to identify and arrest alcohol impaired drivers.

"This You Drink and Drive. You Lose. Mobilization will focus public attention on the dangers posed by drunk driving," said Chief Charles L. Scherpa. "We'll have extra traffic enforcement looking for impaired drivers, as well as those who speed, drive aggressively, and do not use safety belts and child safety seats."

In the 459 motor vehicle-related fatalities in Massachusetts in 2002, alcohol was a factor. This rate is eight percent higher than the national average.

The UMass Police Department will also be taking back to school security measures. The department received a grant last year to endorse the Massachusetts Governors Highway Safety Bureau Click It or Ticket campaign, which enforces safety belt laws.

"We always put out additional staff the first few days of school," said Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor. "We'll be covering all the First Week events and having additional officers out on patrol."

International fee rejected

months, and I think that factored into the University's decision."

GEO filed a complaint against the University on behalf of the one thousand international graduate students and six hundred international undergraduate students who belong to the union. Not only did the members claim the fee to be discriminatory, but they also claimed that the fee was a violation of their contract as unionized employees at the University.

The fee targeting international students was designed to support services provided by the International Programs Office (IPO). The IPO budget suffered a $240 thousand cut in fiscal 2004 following an unprecedented $21.3 million reduction in the University's state appropriation. A portion of the arbitrator's document read, "the University's ability to collect and retain fees has led to the use of fees as a means of offsetting some of its budgetary difficulties."

GEO members march in protest of the New International Student Fee in February 2004.

According to an earlier statement from GEO, both domestic and international students use the IPO, which makes the new fee discriminatory to foreign students. "Most people are very happy with the decision," said Turner. "The arbitration result is an indication for the civil rights of international students on this campus."

Since 2002, IPO's budget has dropped from $600 thousand to $120 thousand, affecting the salaries of eight full-time senior staff members. IPO was forced to trim its operations, and planned to substantially fund remaining services through the $65 per-semester fee.

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 2004

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Welcome to the University: A learning experience

The word "university" is derived from the latin phrase, "the whole," or, "a corpurate body." You are entering a place of higher learning, a place that is designed to teach you the kind of information you will need to go out into the working world. In a word, this institution intends to teach you everything you can possibly imagine. Hopefully, in nine short months, you'll be a more well-rounded person.

As anyone who has spent even a single semester in college will tell you, however, these next 135 school days are just as much about what you learn outside the classroom as what you discover within the hallowed halls. Many of you will be exposed to things you've never seen before. For you southerners, get ready for the snowy, frosty winters that cost this campus in cloudy white from late November until early March. Those of you from the west, while we may not have bigger mountains out here on the east coast, we certainly have plenty of places and experiences to check out, from the quaint antiques stores in Northhampton and Amherst, to the hustle and bustle of the four major cities within a few hours' drive from here.

Of course, the new experiences aren't limited to those from afar — and we do come from all over the globe, from Canada to Japan and everywhere in between — for those of you who have lived in New England all your life, even those who are entering their final year — or years — here, there are always new things to find.

What is important to remember is that there is no single "UMass experience." This school is a different place for every person who spends time here, whether it's a rip-roaring four-year party, or an intense half-decade of study and introspection. There are plenty of books available that will show you how to have fun in college, how to be frugal in college, how to get the most out of your college experience, and as helpful as those myriad guides may be, there are two key words that ensure you'll leave here with a sense of accomplishment and satisfaction: try everything.

Check out a concert by that band with the really silly name. Go to one (even if it's just one) residence hall ice cream social; it's amazing what can happen in the next few months if you spend the next few days meeting people. Talk to the person in your hall with the really obnoxious music and crazy room decorations. Check out the beautiful views you can find hidden in the concrete jungle of the campus. Check out a few sporting events, cheer your guts out for the Maroon and White. Watch a Red Sox-Yankee game with someone who supports the other team — there are plenty of fans of both squads, you'll see. Take a drive, a bike ride, or even a walk through some of the beautiful country north and west of Amherst, head down to Springfield and compare the nightlife to your own "home city." Check out all the residential areas, because as much fun as your current one may be (or not), there are over 20,000 people at this school, so you're bound to find a couple of great spots all over campus. You may not like everything, but you're guaranteed to love something.

Most of all, don't get caught in a routine, don't let yourself waste a day here, because rain, shine, hail or blizzard, there are always new nooks and crannies to be explored.

Some people knock schools like UMass, saying they're too big, but UMass is only as big as you want it to be, because if you go out and open your mind to the thousands of things going on every day here, you'll find a niche that makes this large school feel just like home. Yes, you're here to learn "everything." But make sure you learn as much as you can about yourself, too, because this might be your best chance to do so.

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, as your daily tour guide, we at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian would like to say, enjoy the ride.

Only men can stop violence against women

Ben Atherton-Zeman

Guys on the UMass campus have a crucial role to play in ending violence against women.

On many college campuses, the first two weeks of the fall semester are dangerous times for young women, in particular for first-year students. The freedom of a college social environment is exciting and stimulating to first-year women, unfortunately, this excitement can easily be exploited.

Sadly, I know this because I used to take part in such exploitation. As a young man, I was taught that making out or fooling around with someone was a goal, and that there were certain obstacles to reaching this goal. Consent was something to be obtained — through pleading, cajoling and other manipulation if possible. If the woman I was with consented to just one kiss, I'd try to make that kiss "count." If she became aroused through the one kiss, then I assumed we could keep going.

Even though several women confronted me at the time, I refused to hear what they had to say. I chose instead to focus on my own feelings of victimization for "having rumors spread about me." But years later, I heard from some women that I had hurt them with this behavior. By then, I had already dedicated my life to stopping men's violence against women and had worked in several domestic violence programs and rape crisis centers. I discovered that I was not only part of the solution; I had been part of the problem in the not-so distant past.

Some guys use other techniques to make out, fool around with or have sex with women. These men use drugs or alcohol, stalking or physical violence. "These men" are also our brothers, our hall mates, our classmates and sometimes ourselves. Like "these men," I used to care more about making out with these women than I cared about the women themselves.

I made choices that hurt them.

Of course, not all victims are female and not all perpetrators male, but 90 percent of the time, members of my gender commit violence against women. Many of us commit, condone or remain silent about men's violence against women. We have an opportunity to confront this violence, and to confront the sexism that allows this violence to continue.

We can become part of the solution by confronting sexist comments or actions (including our own), by behaving and supporting sexual assault survivors, by volunteering a the Everywomen's Center or with other campus groups.

If you are a guy reading this column, I challenge you to think about two things. First, think about how you may make the women in your life feel unsafe. Have you used coercion or manipulation to have sex or fool around with someone? Have you given someone alcohol or drugs so they will "relax" and be more likely to fool around with you? Have you told sexist jokes, or laughed when a sexist joke was told? If confronted on your sexism, have you listened well or were you defensive? Did you blow it off?

Second, think about how you can help stop violence against women. Most of us don't want to hurt those we love: our girlfriends and female friends, our sisters and mothers. We can become part of the solution by confronting sexist comments or actions (including our own), by believing and supporting sexual assault survivors, by volunteering at the Everywoman's Center or with other campus groups.

We can also write letters to the editor at the Collegian. For the first two weeks of this semester, male leaders will be writing letters to the editor, urging other males to become part of the solution to this problem of sexual violence. Together, we can help create a campus where every romantic or sexual encounter only happens through communication and consent. By consent, we don't mean manipulated, forced or "taken" consent; we mean consent freely given, brought about by both parties' desires and a communication that grows between two people. Many UMass administration, staff, faculty and student leaders support this goal.

You will be hearing from them.

I encourage men or women who have similar feelings to write, speak out and cumfront sexual violence on this campus – not just these first two weeks, but all year long.

So long sweet summer

Matt Brochu

People, it feels so good to be back. September is here once again, and we all know what that means. More classes, less cleavage, and National Grandparents' Day on September 12. Consider this a heads up: send a card. They'll appreciate it.

Anyway, now that summer's over, we're finally free of those crappy summer jobs, the who-did-who's of hometown gossip, and those damn parents who blame you for every computer problem and hint that you have a drinking problem on a daily basis. It's always a breath of fresh air to come back to Amherst and get back into the swing of our crappy campus jobs, the who-did-who-over-the-summer's of UMass gossip, and those damn RD's who blame you for every dorm problem and hint, through bulletin boards, that you have a drinking problem on a daily basis. But hey, change is good.

Although everyone insists on putting cheerleader-like emphasis on the importance of the upcoming semester, sometimes it's just as important to rewind and take a look back at the summer that lies in our collective wake. So without further ado, here's what apparently happened between Commencement in May and that stupid Convocation thing that the freshmen were suckered into going to.

The Democratic National Convention came to Massachusetts, and I'll openly admit that I know only two things about it: 1.) Watching it gave me that feeling in my stomach that I get when I watch middle-aged people dance to "Kool and the Gang" at weddings. and 2) It absolutely destroyed my plans to go out drinking in Boston that weekend, forcing me to sit at home and continuously email the "Boston Globe" with fake sightings for their ridiculously un-confirmable Celebrity Sightings List. To those of you who actually went out to the park that Sunday in hopes of seeing Stephanie Tanner walking her dog Comet, well I owe you an apology.

In real celebrity news, Ashlee Simpson stormed onto the music scene, gaining credibility and giving hope to not-as-good-looking, not-as-talented little sisters with underlying body image issues across the nation. If this logic holds true, Britney Spears' little sister will be bigger than Madonna and Michael Jackson combined. Ms. Simpson also became the first girl to stubbornly refuse to get rid of her bangs since my friend Kelley put those bushy things to rest in April of eighth grade. As for her older sister Jessica, the size of her mouth seems to grow with every song she sings.

Britney, however would not be outdone by little Simpson; announcing her engagement in June to current back-up dancer and current Sharjackson's-baby's-daddy, Kevin Federline. Spears confirms that yes, employing her fiancé isn't all that different from prostitution, but she admits that although she is afraid of a quick, tabloid divorce with Federline, her greatest fear of all is getting served.

In movie news, "I, Robot" opened at the box office amidst much fanfare, almost breaking even by September. Unfortunately, I, Must confess that I, Didn't see the movie because I, Haven't really liked Will Smith since "I, Ndependence Day" and I, Spent my $10 on "A Cinderella Story" instead, which ended up being amazing.

In non-Red-Sox-related sports news, the United States Olympic Basketball team suffered its first-ever defeat (with NBA player participation) to Puerto Rico, spurring an unnecessary outbreak of "Nightmare Team" headlines across the nation. In terms of population, this loss was roughly the equivalent of getting blown out by the state of Massachusetts (starring Travis Best and Vinny Del Negro).

In a shocking twist, this triumph was overshadowed by a more stunning upset when the United States got its revenge in defeating Puerto Rico in "Olympic Pimp My Ride-ing," as Xzibit's '94 Acura Integra with the wheel-mounted Playstation 2s overcame Carmelo Travieso's '94 Acura Integra with the glove compartment guinea pig cage. This marked the first time in over 20 years of International Competition that the Puerto Rican team failed to claim the golden prize for the tackiest car with really unnecessary accessories.

Stealing the spotlight from Lindsey Lohan in girls-that-just-came-of-age news, Mary Kate Olsen checked into the Cirque Lodge, a well-known celebrity substance abuse rehabilitation center, under the guise of an eating disorder (later rumors suspected cocaine addiction). As an only child I can sympathize with Mary Kate's struggles with her own identity and her desire to differentiate herself from her twin sister. At least now, in response to the "How do I tell you two apart?" question, instead of answering, "Ashley's hair is mahogany. Mine is auburn," she can now say, "I'm the one with the deviated septum."

Well I'm running out of time here, but in other news, Usher made women love him by singing about why his ex-woman hates him, UMass apparently tried to build a moat around the library, and Rick James died ... bitch. That's your news for now. Stay classy, UMass. I'm Matt...Brochu? DAMMIT, WHO TYPED A QUESTION MARK IN THE TELEPROMPTER!

I am going to die

Zach Oeschlegel

Preferably, not soon, it's just that lately I've been realizing more and more over the last few months that, I am not as invincible as I once was. For instance, my knees crack every time I crouch down from years of being a catcher in baseball. I get somewhat out of breath after twenty minutes of playing ultimate frisbee. Some of these things can be fixed fairly easily with exercise, but other little ailments like my bad knees I will have for the rest of my life. It's a constant reminder that I'm a little frailer than I originally thought and that I really need to take advantage of these next ten years of youth before I get old.

Then I start thinking about all the things I should've done over my last two years here at UMass and man, I really blew it. Listening to Pink Floyd's "Time" has made me think a little more about the future. I remember sitting in my dorm room playing video games, because, as Roger Waters put it, "I was young and life is long, and there is time to kill today." Sadly, I sit here at my computer and find out that two years have come behind, and, "no one told me when to run. I missed the starting gun."

Naturally, I know people will tell me that this isn't so. They'll point to the fact that I'm a Collegian columnist, that I'm an officer of Campus Crusade for Christ here at UMass, that I went skydiving last year, yada, yada, yada. In that sense, I have done more with my college time here than most. My gut feeling, however, is a bit how Oscar Schindler felt at the end of Schindler's List, as he realized how much fortune he still had and how many more lives he could have saved. And, like Oscar, I am not at all satisfied with what I have done here. I want more.

So now I "run and I run to catch up with the sun but it's sinking." With everyday that passes, I am one more day closer to the day that I die. And I'm not even old enough to drink.

What is exciting about this, however, is that I realize that. The first two years of my college experience have been without question, the fastest of my life. I'm completely stoked that these next two years are going to be amazing. How much better it would have been if I made the most out of my first two?

This is where everyone else comes in. You are all going to die. Many of us have realized that, but I doubt that the majority of underclassmen have. I know it's something I never dealt with before college.

I wish that when I had first come here, people told me that the most important thing about this place wasn't making the A. Yeah, bringing home a 3.7 to Mom and Dad has its benefits, but it is nowhere near the top of the list. College is all about learning what you can't learn in the classroom, considering over half of the classes you will take here are useless. They will be in huge lecture halls with professors who relate better to camels than to humans, and while it may be nice to know how to multiply matrices or what the different aspects of light are, you will forget them immediately and not really have any more understanding of life.

We don't learn by sitting, we learn by doing. Likewise, the most you'll learn from playing the computer is that it is still impossible to beat the computer at chess on "hard," and that Doom VI won't be out in November like you had hoped.

But hanging out with friends, asking that girl out, screaming for UMass athletics? You'll learn a lot more from those types of events than from most of your classes. Understanding people and meeting them, or finding out that this type of quality is what you look for in a girl, or finding ways to connect to others are more important than that 3.7 GPA. When you go out and do something as opposed to reading about it, you will actually learn something. You're not going to learn how to be a public speaker unless you actually speak in public.

So don't be the kid who never leaves his room because he's too shy. Don't be that guy who skips the road trip because he has a test the following week. Don't be that person who stays in because he just doesn't feel like it.

You'll only end up "shorter of breath, and one day closer to death."

Late dive for crude

Yousef Munayyer

In 1995, Equatorial Guinea, a tiny and tremendously poor West African nation was considered one of the most impoverished and miserable economic situations on the planet. So much so in fact that the U.S. closed down its embassy for cost-cutting reasons. However, only a few weeks later, oil and natural gas deposits were discovered under the waters of this tiny nation. This triggered the West African oil rush and led ExxonMobil, Tirton Energy, Samedan Oil, CMS Energy and Vanco to invest nearly $5 billion since then. The day and night change shocked the nation and sent it into an economic boom even though most of the labor came from outside Equatorial Guinea's small population of 400,000.

In this case the United States got lucky. However, in Sudan the situation is not so bright. Darfur, a western province of Sudan, is home to what has been called the "world's worst humanitarian crisis" and even "genocide." Putting legal terms aside for a moment, the harsh reality on the ground is that 30,000-50,000 people are dead according to the UN deputy secretary general for humanitarian affairs. About 1.2 million people have been forced from their homes during the 17 months of conflict. About 200,000 have taken refuge in neighboring Chad, which borders on the Darfur province.

The numbers do not begin to echo the horrors which are taking place on the ground and outside involvement is necessary to ease the suffering of crying mothers and hungry children.

The question that came to my mind was why Sudan and why now?

The New York-based International Rescue Committee reported in 2001 that 2.5 million people had died as a result of the three-year-old civil war in neighboring Congo. Also in neighboring Uganda tens of thousands have been killed, mutilated and beheaded by rebel groups and 1.6 million have been displaced.

In 1999, significant oil deposits became accessible from southern Sudan ... Suddenly the United States found enough cause for humanitarian concern.

The crisis in Darfur is undoubtedly part of a larger picture. Sudan has been experiencing a 21-year civil war, which had come close to resolution after the recent and historic agreements signed by the government and rebel groups in the south. The United States began to play a role in the brokering of this agreement only recently, as much of the hard negotiating work was done by other African states. Sudan was on terrorist lists; it was home to a bloody civil war, and didn't have anything to offer to the United States. Then, in 1999, significant oil deposits became accessible from southern Sudan. This would set Sudan aside from Uganda and Congo. Suddenly the United States found enough cause for humanitarian concern.

An end to the civil war could lift sanctions from Sudan and open its oil market to the United States. This was perhaps not a major concern until Sudan's oil production nearly doubled, making it a more worthy prize. Sudan's energy minister estimates a production of 500,000 barrels per day in 2005. Now take that number and multiply by about 49 cents a barrel and you get millions of reasons to care about the suffering in Darfur.

In October of 2002 President Bush signed the Sudan Peace Act, which would promote a resolution to the 21-year-old conflict. Then in May of 2004, as the world was condemning the Sudanese government for funding deadly militias in Darfur, the United States removed Sudan from a list of nations that aide al-Qaeda. This move puts them closer and closer to lifting sanctions.

But why the rush? Sudan's oil is not going to make an immediate impact even though it has a promising future. The reality is that the U.S. is looking to jump into the game late. Major competitors in the global arena for energy resources have beat the United States to Sudan. After a Canadian company sold its share to Sudanese oil due to pressure from humanitarian groups, Sweden became the only remaining western nation that had a piece of Sudan's crude pie. Among the rest of the nations in the ring are China and India, two major competitors with growing populations and economies. The Russians have also jumped into the game recently as Stroitransgaz (a Russian corporation) won a bid this past spring to a 2 month project to construct a new 367 kilometer pipeline. An Indian corporation also won a bid to build another pipeline, this one a 741 kilometer/16-month project through Sudan. China, which uses Sudan as the base of its African oil projects, owns 40 percent of the Greater Nile Petroleum Company, the main international consortium extracting oil from Sudan.

China, India and Russia, major competitors, are all getting a piece of the pie and the U.S. is left behind in this battle. The policy makers in Washington are seeing black in Sudan, but not because they are eyeing the Darfuris. Once again Washington is ashamed of its realism and slips back into its politically hypocritical shell.

Cosby's criticism warranted

Matthew Reid

Last spring, comedian Bill Cosby raised several eyebrows when he made some rather frank statements about the condition of education in America, focusing specifically on the deterioration of language among black students. "I can't even pronounce some of the words these kids are using," Cosby said.

The truth is that children of all backgrounds and colors use a different vernacular nowadays, even when compared to when I was in elementary school only 10 or so years ago. And when you compare the situation to the way it was 25 or even 50 years ago, the difference is staggering.

The truth is, children of all backgrounds and colors use a different vernacular nowadays, even when compared to when I was in elementary school only 10 or so years ago.

Cosby was highly critical of school systems in America, saying that the values they instill are not in line with a "proper upbringing." While it does seem a little presumptuous to say what the "proper" upbringing should be, it is clear that teachers these days take a much more "liberal" approach to teaching language.

I've heard of teachers using Eminem lyrics as examples of poetry in high school and even middle school English classes. Granted, rap music does use several poetic devices (such as involved rhyme schemes, alliteration, personification, etc.), but a conscious decision has to be made to choose Eminem over a more conventional poet. While using a popular rapper might make children more interested in the subject matter, is it worth exposing them to such language in a school? A teacher should make it their job to make students interested in learning but to bring Eminem lyrics into a middle school classroom seems a bit counterpuductive.

While Cosby's comments on teachers were met with some controversy his remarks on parents were what really made the headlines. When talking about the use of language among children, Cosby said, "I blamed the kid until I heard the mother talk. And then I heard the father talk. Everybody knows it's important to speak English except these knuckleheads ... you can't be a doctor with that kind of crap coming out of your mouth."

I had the pleasure of seeing Cosby in person when he came to my old elementary school in Athol last May. He stressed that the problems he speaks of are present among every ethnic group (Athol has a predominantly white population). "We all must get back to the roots of parenting, and instill responsibility and pride in our children," Cosby said. "Letting our kids talk like these rappers is not helping."

That leads into Cosby's next criticism, which centers on popular entertainers. "If kids would start using their $15 to buy books instead of these rap CD's, I bet their vocabulary would improve overnight," he said.

I usually give entertainers (musicians, movie stars, athletes) the benefit of the doubt when it comes to negatively influencing children. However, while researching this column, I spoke with an eleven-year-old boy named James, who I know very well. James comes from a very rural, very white background. I asked him some questions about words that he knows and uses, and I was surprised to hear just how colorful his language was. When I asked him where he had learned one particularly "adult" phrase, he said, "My friend gave me a Kid Rock CD, and he sounded cool."

It may be easy to blame James' parents and teachers for "letting him listen to such adult-oriented music, but I know for a fact that James' mother spends a lot of time with him, and he has many teachers that spend a lot of time with him as well. However, you can't keep an eye on a kid 100 percent of the time. Kids simply have countless more opportunities to be exposed to vulgar language now than they used to, and keeping it from them is nearly impossible.

It saddened me when I had that conversation with James. When I was his age, I would never dream of using "questionable" language in front of my parents or my teachers. I've never been one to blame entertainers for influencing America's youth, and I know that most parents and teachers do a commendable job raising their children. But clearly somewhere something is going wrong, and something has to be done.

I don't know what problem needs to be fixed first. Maybe it's getting negative speech out of popular entertainment. Maybe it's getting teachers to stress the importance of language more. Maybe it's getting parents to read more to their kids. Most likely, it's a combination of all of these and more. I wish there was a quick and easy solution to the problem. But one thing Cosby has said all along is that this problem isn't going away anytime soon, especially if people don't wake up and do something about it. Hopefully, that will happen sooner rather than later.

Universities crack down on slacker applicants

Allison Edles

As more and more high school graduates are choosing to attend college, the admissions process becomes more of a challenge with each incoming freshman class. However, with the outpour of new students, colleges and universities have needed to "crack down" on their newly accepted freshmen, which have experienced bouts of "senioritis" in their last year of high school. The Washington Post recently published an article outlining how more and more well known universities are reconsidering the admission status of applicants who have slacked off during their senior year. "Senioritis" is something that seems to come naturally to every upcoming high school senior. However, mainstream colleges and universities are right in their decisions to hold firmer policies towards students who have declined in their academic grade point averages or who have traded in more challenging courses for easier ones.

According to the University of Massachusetts website on general freshman undergraduate admission standards, "The average high school weighted GPA for freshmen entering in Fall 2003 is 3.4 on a 4.0 scale. If a student does not meet the 3.0 GPA minimum then a SAT/GPA sliding scale applies. The lowest GPA, which may be considered for admission, is a 2.0. Simply meeting minimums does not guarantee admission; the admission process is competitive." Nothing is directly stated on the website that makes any mention of the standard expected of students in their senior year, but one can assume from the the competitive atmosphere in the aforementioned statement that declining grades will result in a lesser GPA meeting more of the minimum acceptance standards rather than the average or ideal acceptance standards.

Typically throughout the undergraduate college admissions process, students are required to submit multiple copies of their transcripts throughout the year, including one final transcript at the end of their senior year. One very common statement on many admissions letters to students is that "admission is contingent upon their performance throughout their senior year." This statement seems to be taken for granted more often than not, but can carry more significance than the weight of a high school diploma.

Many universities, including mainstream and alternative schools, such as the University of Maryland-College Park and Texas Christian University, have been taking direct action to remedy the problem of declining grades amongst their applicants. One method that these universities have chosen to reach their applicants is by writing a letter. According to the article published in The Washington Post, the letter would be a mild warning requesting details on the reasons surrounding a student's senior year performance. A more austere version of the letter would include a sentence stating that the student's admission to that college/university is in jeopardy.

For students who have just completed their senior year in high school, the thought of their college admission being rescinded can be the furthest thing from their mind. Particularly if the student made the choice to apply early decision to a school and got accepted, the onus is placed on that student to keep up his or her grades. It is a common myth to believe that once an applicant is accepted to a college/university, that the acceptance is guaranteed. Unfortunately, more and more students are not taking that factor into consideration once they receive their acceptance letters.

For universities to crack down on their admissions criteria to high school seniors who have exhibited less than the average performance expected of them is to properly handle the difficult situation in which many of these admissions deans have been placed. No higher education facility wants to deny admission to any student, but colleges may find that they are forced to if that student's behavior and performance is not up to par with their codes and standards at the time when their admission is still not finalized.

Up close and personal

Paige Cram

Being a New Jersey native, it was a summer full of unusual events. Strange weather patterns brought us severe floods and even tornados, which are highly uncommon in our area. But the biggest storm by far took place in the political arena.

On August 12, Governor Jim McGreevey announced his resignation on national television, simultaneously announcing to the public that he is "a gay American."

McGreevey's resignation is controversial in itself, but the complex circumstances under which it took place make it ever more so. His alleged boyfriend was brought here from Israel several years ago and given a job for which he was unqualified. After complaints arose, he left the job quietly and was placed somewhere else. Recently, however, the man, Golan Cipel, was essentially blackmailing the governor with the secret of his sexuality.

It's true that McGreevey may have done things wrong as a governor, things which were maybe even worthy of a resignation. But that's not why he decided to leave office.

In his powerful and poignant speech, the governor talked about personal truths and the importance of admitting one's own reality to oneself. He didn't resign because of the mistakes he made; he resigned because the world was going to find out his "dirty little secrets." It doesn't matter if you do a good job; it doesn't matter if people like you. If you have a weakness or personal flaw, you're opponents will find it, exploit it and use it to their advantage. Is there no privacy for public figures anymore? Just how personal does something have to be for it to remain personal?

It seems that starting with the Clinton presidency, the "personal" life of politicians became fair game. But why should they have any less right to privacy then the rest of us? Sure, we have every right to know about their voting records and political beliefs, but what gives anyone the right to pry into the sexual life of another person? Frankly, it doesn't matter to me what kind of underwear the president wears or who the governor prefers to sleep with. As long as the elected officials are doing their jobs and staying out of illegal activity, then the rest is none of my business.

With this being the year for a presidential election, it's important for us not to be distracted by petty and theatrical politics. We need to focus on the issues, not the "scandals." And most importantly, we need to choose a leader who is focused on introducing the future instead of digging up the past.

DNC protesters fill free-speech zone in Boston city streets

Thousands of people from around the country congregated at the site of Boston's Fleet Center, the gathering place for the multitudes of Democrats, in hopes that their messages would be heard by the delegates and Senator John Kerry himself.

The Free-Speech Zone

Many expressed outrage at the idea of the designated "free speech zone," an area specifically for the use of corralling protesters around the Fleet Center. Although authorities claim that the free speech zone, which included barbed wire and high chain link fencing, was for safety purposes, many felt that their First Amendment rights had been severely violated.

Several protestors referred to the zone as a concentration camp. "There is no hope [for the United States]," said protestor Christopher Young, of Providence, RI. "The 9/11 collapses were due to our government, and I am not supporting either candidate."

Signs reading 'Don't Fence me in!' and 'Stupid Nets' littered the usually placid Canal Street, where chalk reading 'Free speech = 9/11 victim # 2' adorned the sidewalks.

One group of women called the 'Missledick Chicks' paraded around the free speech zone mocking President Bush. "God Bless Texeca," they sang, "that's how you spread democracy, with missiles!"

Bush supporters were also present in large numbers shouting, "Abortion equals murder" and, "Kerry is a good for nothing cross dresser!"

One local pizza joint made headlines after its owners refused to take down a larger banner hanging out front, "Say!!! D.N.C. Thanks for Nothing. GO BUSH!"

The owners of Half Time King of Pizza closed its doors the week of the convention and blamed the Democrats for taking away a week of business.

A family from Billerica came to the site of the convention to witness the chaos and to protest the protesters. David, David Jr. and Pat Marone carried a sign that read, 'SHUT UP!' and flashed in front of protesters.

"This is like a Sunday, it's July, this is awful," Dave Marone said. Marone said that the streets should be filled with tourists and Bostonians, not protesters.

NBC, CBS, and other major networks broadcast live from the press booths inside the Fleet Center.

Kerry fans rally support:

While there were hundreds of protesters, there were just as many supporters in favor of the Democrat's convention.

David Stevenson of Vermont, handed out stickers and pins that read, 'Dean for Kerry.' "Thank you Howard Dean for getting the ball rolling," he shouted into the crowd. "We've got to have another revolution." Stevenson said, who hopes that Howard Dean will become President of the United States.

As for Dean's outburst after the Iowa Caucus, Stevenson thinks that "He [Howard Dean] was just trying to be heard."

Inside the Fleet Center, hundreds of members of the democratic delegation and the media were present. Also in attendance were dozens of celebrities who wanted to use their notability for the Democrats. Stars in attendance included John Cusak, Boyd Tingsley of the Dave Matthews Band, Lewis Black from Comedy Central, Omarosa and Kwame from the Apprentice, Steve Bresheimer, Ben Affleck, Jerry Springer, controversial filmmaker Michael Moore and the cast of HBO's 'Curb Your Enthusiasm.'

Comedian and Political Analyst Lewis Black is enthusiastic to give his support to the Democrats, but as for a sense of humor, he said, "C'mon, none of these guys are funny."

Several pregnant women joined together wearing shirts with 'M.O.B.' an acronym for Mothers Opposing Bush on their busting tummies.

"Our mission is to get the facts out, get the voters out and get the administration out of office and to mobilize moms to work for our children," said one group member.

Clinton urges Americans toward Kerry

On the Monday of the convention, roaring delegates rose to their feet rallying and waving signs for former President William Jefferson Clinton. Clinton spoke on behalf of the Democratic Party, emphasizing that Americans need a president who will make America united again.

Clinton also criticized the president for not uniting America after the September 11th terrorist attacks.

"We don't need a divided America," he said. "We Democrats want to build a world, an America of shared responsibilities and shared benefits."

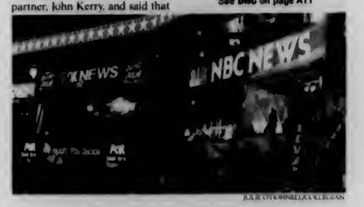
Clinton said that in addition to walking away from our allies after 9/11, "they [the Bush administration] have made equally fateful decisions."

Clinton mentioned and joked about how well he has been taken care of by the Republican's tax cuts to the wealthy, but he concluded that these tax cuts are not fair to the middle class."The rest of you are paying the bill," he said.

Clinton praised Senator Kerry for his patriotism and courage in the Vietnam War. "John Kerry – a true New England Patriot for President," he said. "Say to him what he has always said to America, 'send me'. John Kerry will make choices that will reflect both wisdom and common sense."

He concluded his speech with an allusion to the Scripture, "Be not afraid," he said, "strength and wisdom are not opposing values – they go hand in hand. Now that we are all in the same boat, we should choose a captain of our ship who is a brave man and knows how to steer a vessel through troubled waters, send John Kerry!"

Clinton received overwhelming applause from an emotional crowd as well as from his wife Hillary Rodham Clinton who had introduced her husband.



John Edwards accepts VP nomination.

Vice Presidential Nominee John Edwards preached to the delegates about the call for change and reassured the democrats of America that 'hope is on the way.' Edwards also accepted his nomination for Vice Presidency.

Edwards talked about his partner, John Kerry, and said that Kerry is, "a man who represents real American values and we must and we will elect him for the next President of the United States."

He emphasized on how he and Kerry plan to make America stronger because right now there two divided types of Americans. He said that there are those who are living the American dream and

Murray family still has hope

University campus last winter.

22-year-old Maura Murray, a nursing student, is still missing after 7 months. It was February 9, 2004 when the Hanson, Mass. resident packed up her belongings from her Kennedy Hall dorm room, drove her car to New Hampshire and got into a minor car accident. After the accident, she vanished without a trace. She has not been seen or heard from since that cold February evening.

Maura's parents, Laurie and Fred Murray, have said all along that her daughter had excellent grades. Murray was a Dean's list student a track star in high school, and a close friend to many.

Murray has described her daughter's relationship with her boyfriend, Army Lt. Bill Rauch of Oklahoma as "a very, very good relationship." However, Maura's family and friends suspect foul play was involved in the young woman's disappearance.

Her disappearance

There are clues indicating that Maura Murray may have had some personal troubles just before she left UMass.

Maura allegedly left her campus job the Thursday before she disappeared and co-workers described her state as upset and troubled, according to WCVB-TV.

In an interview with WCVB-TV, Maura's older sister, Kathleen Murray of Hanover, Mass., admitted that she had a phone conversation with Maura that evening.

"It was just a regular phone call. It made no difference to me. It was just Maura calling me, that was that. I told her about my day and quarreling with my fiancée," Murray said. "I don't know what I could have done to upset her... Seriously, I think she just wanted to get out of work."

New Hampshire State Police Lt. John Scarinza is one of the lead investigators on the Murray case. He disputes Kathleen Murray's statement about her sister trying to leave work early.

"It wasn't a case where she called the supervisor and said, 'Listen, I've had a bad phone call...' The supervisor on her own initiative said, 'Why don't you take the rest of the night off? I'll walk you to your dorm.' So clearly she was upset," Scarinza told WCVB-TV.

It was less than four days later when Maura decided to leave UMass. She apparently had some type of plan before for her departure.

In the early morning hours of Monday, Feb. 9th Maura performed an Internet search for directions to Burlington, VT and the Berkshires.

"Sometime between Sunday and Monday morning, she packed up all her belongings in her dorm room, to include taking all her pictures off the walls, taking everything out of her bureaus, [and] put them all in boxes [and] left [them] on her bed," Scarinza told WCVB-TV. "[She] left a personal note to her boyfriend on top of the boxes."

Maura Murray's vehicle was then found in the town of Haverhill, N.H. crashed and abandoned on the side of the road. Her doors were reportedly locked and a few items had been removed from her car.

Authorities did not begin their search for Murray until Feb. 11, to the dismay of her parents.

A POSSIBLE LINK

It was only about one month after Maura's disappearance when another disappearance of a young woman shocked the northern New England region where Maura was last seen.

17-year-old Brianna Maitland of Montgomery, VT disappeared March 19th after leaving her restaurant job.

About one hour after she left work, her car was found backed into an abandoned barn about 1 mile away. Her disappearance took place only 90 miles from where Maura was last seen.

The Murray family has publicly said they are not disregarding the idea that there may be a link between the two disappearances.

"If you think about it, both of them had minor accidents and they both disappeared without a trace," Laurie Murray told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Both the families of Murray and Maitland have publicly said they want their respective law enforcement agencies to investigate further if there is a missing link between the two disappearances.

Police are not dismissing the link theory, but have said it is unlikely.

"It's hard to believe you'd have that bad of luck," said Scarinza, "We are open minded to anything, but there is no evidence to suggest the cases are related."

NO NEW LEADS

On July 13th, a search of the woods was conducted, which involved about 90 people. It covered a one-mile radius from where Maura was last seen.

Officials recovered several articles of clothing, but none of the items found were linked to Murray.

"As of this date, none of the clothing items recovered appears to have belonged to Maura or appear to be linked to her disappearance. Of the miscellaneous items that were located by the searchers to include several bottles and other products, they do not

PVTA bus system forced to reduce Northampton route

By Megan Daley
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST— The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority was forced to reduce one of its routes due to budget cuts, affecting UMass students taking classes at Smith College.

The M40 bus route, which runs an express line from UMass to Smith College, is running on a reduced schedule this year, making eight trips daily instead of last year's 14, said Al Byam, the General Manager of UMass Transit.

According to Al Byam, the M40 route was originally going to be eliminated completely and the compromise of a reduced route was due to "resolved budget negotiations."

The M40 route was dropped on July 1, but fears of worsening traffic conditions on Route 9 and overcrowding in B43 buses, the only other buses that go from UMass to Northampton, made the organization announce on August 28 that it would reinstate the route as of September 7.

PVTA officials also realized that they would have to add additional buses to the B43 route to compensate for the loss of the M40 and decided that doing so would cost almost as much as keeping the express route.

Five Colleges Inc., the consortium of local colleges and UMass, also worried that dropping the express route would make students less likely to be able to attend classes at other schools. Students depend on this route for exchange between schools and its elimination might make students hesitant to take advantage of taking classes at a different school.

The M40 and B43 bus routes are run by the Hampshire County Transit, rather than the UMass transit department. So far, no UMass routes have been cut, but some town outreach routes have had their schedules reduced.

Last February, PVTA administrator Gary Shepard broke the news of bus route budget cuts to Hampshire County citizens. The people responded by agreeing to "work with the PVTA in order to help offset the proposed cuts in bus routes due to $1.5 million deficit." The lobbying effort was successful, saving the M40 route from elimination for at least one year.

The reduced schedule will save $8,300 for the Five College consortium, said a recent press release.

When Shepard originally announced the budget cuts last February, he said that he had written a letter to Governor Mitt Romney in December asking for "dedicated funding." According to Byam, Romney has "ignored that completely."

Byam said local legislators are working closely with the PVTA to find new sources of funding.

One such legislator is Northampton Mayor Claire Higgins who, according to a report in the Daily Hampshire Gazette, has pledged her help in finding funding to make up for the federal grant that was lost to the PVTA.

SGA looks toward new year

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

While University of Massachusetts students were busy enjoying the summer and relaxing, Eduardo Bustamante, student government president, has been actively pursuing goals for the upcoming school year.

Elected last spring, Bustamante has already put together several proposals in hopes to improve the academics and affordability of the University.

Shorter Term:

The first major proposed idea is to reduce the price of textbooks by incorporating a rental system.

"Kids are spending between $600 to $1,000 in text books every year," Bustamante said. "In other schools, both public and private, kids are spending $60 to $100 per semester on textbooks."

Currently, efollet, a private company that supplies the Textbook Annex with the textbooks, has a contract with the University that extends until July 2005.

"I think you should be able to rent books as long as you give the books back in good condition at the end of the semester," Bustamante said. "People need to be aware that they can save a lot of money."

An overwhelming 75 percent of the student population voted for this proposal in one of the referendum questions last April. Bustamante hopes to begin a rental system by the start of the Fall 2005 semester.

Long Term

Bustamante has extensively researched and begun a proposal to increase class availability, decrease class size and increase the quality of education. He plans to make this idea work by making it possible for students to take only four classes per semester and still be able to graduate in four years.

"This is something that is really great as we research it more," Bustamante said. "It wouldn't effect the classes offered it would mean each class is slightly more intensive."

Although this proposal is still being researched, Bustamante hopes to enforce this idea within the next couple of years. He believes that because the four-class program has worked in several other institutions, such as the University of New Hampshire, that it can be beneficial to UMass students as well.

"It allows you to concentrate more on your classes," he said. "This is your school, you have the ability to impose your preference and to make this school what you want of it, so come and see on September 16."

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante speaks to fellow students during last spring semester.

"Other public schools have it like UCal Berkley, as well as every private school."

Bustamante also said that each course would be worth four credits instead of three and the class time would increase by five to ten minutes.

Getting involved:

Beginning September 16, SGA will be having its open forum meeting is various dining commons throughout campus. These meetings are open to the entire UMass community, in hopes that students will propose new ideas and bring up important issues about the University.

"We want students to understand that we have the power to make a change," Bustamante said. "We want them to know the progress that is being made, we're really ambitious and we're really hopeful."

Although it is easy to come to a big school and get lost, Bustamante wants students to know that they can have a voice in the SGA.

ALANA

Last September, former Speaker Jared Nokes refused to recognize the appointed ALANA caucus seats and Bustamante, a senator for ALANA drew in a great deal of attention during his battle with Nokes in efforts to demand recognition.

As for the controversy last year surrounding the recognition of the ALANA caucus by SGA Speaker Jared Nokes and the drama that engulfed the issue of diversity on the seats positions, Bustamante claims that both sides are in agreement now.

"Now that I am elected and I'm doing the job, at this point I can't get thrown out," he said. "The student body, the judiciary council and the senate all want to ensure diversity throughout the seats."

appear to have any relevance to Maura's disappearance," said Scarinza.

Laurie Murray recently reiterated that no new information has been found.

"We continue to never give up hope and we pray," Murray said.

Scarinza said he is hoping someone from UMass might come forward with new information regarding Maura's disappearance. His hope is that Maura did confide in someone as to why she decided to leave school.

"We don't know why Maura left school... Clearly it was her intention to leave school. Clearly she had a destination in mind when she came up north. What clearly did not make sense was that she didn't confide in anyone," Scarinza said.

He went on to say that he is not worried about finding alcohol or drugs if someone were to speak up.

"I'm just worried about finding Maura," he said.

Anyone who has any information about the disappearance of Maura Murray is urged to call New Hampshire State Police Sgt. Robert Bruno. His phone number is 603-846-3333. All calls can remain confidential.

Gas line hit by backhoe near DuBois Library

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

W.E.B Du Bois Library, South College, Thompson Hall and MacInnes Hall were all evacuated Saturday August 28 when a backhoe operator struck natural gas pipeline while digging underground, causing a gas leak. There were no injuries reported.

The two-inch pipe was struck at 10:40 a.m. on the west side of the library while the Garden Engineering backhoe worker was working on the replacement of the library deck, a project that has been ongoing all summer. The leak that caused a noticeable odor in the air, but was stopped within an hour.

"It was a surprise that really strained our resources," said UMass Police Department Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor.

Four workers dug into the ground to locate the leak while Berkshire Gas clamped the line. UMPD, the Amherst Fire Department, and the UMass Environmental Health and Safety department monitored the quality of the air until the area was declared safe at 12:15 p.m.

year contract with UMass Amherst this summer to take over management of the Mullins Center. Global Spectrum succeeds SMG, the original manager and one of the nation's leading operator of major arenas and stadiums, in a contract that took effect July 1.

The arena's new General Manager Bob LeBarron has been negotiating with various promoters to bring more shows and diversity to UMass Amherst.

"I'm excited to be here. This building has great potential," said LeBarron.

LeBarron plans to "expand the horizons of the building" by utilizing the Mullins Center's curtain system, which cuts the arena in half to seat 5,000. This will attract a lot of new and smaller bands that previously weren't interested in performing before a half-empty arena.

While LeBarron was General Manager at the University of New Hampshire one of his promoters always offered cheaper student tickets. LeBarron promises to extend the same benefits UMass Amherst students, and offer discounts whenever possible.

Students can expect a variety of shows including rock, country, ice shows, and theater. They can also count on more grassroots marketing such as posters, flyers, and promotions in the dorms and dining halls. LeBarron says he has already met with local radio stations Lazer 99.3 and Rock 102 to discuss teaming up for upcoming shows.

Due to the Mullins Center's location right off of Interstate 91, LeBarron says it is in "a good position regionally" to attract big crowds. In order to see a big concert, one has to travel at least 40 minutes to either Worcester, Hartford, and even as far as Boston or New York.

LeBarron says the fan experience is a key element in a show's success. Some upcoming plans include band performances outside the arena before the start of a show. With Global Spectrum's company connections and success in other arenas, LeBarron believes that UMass students will be provided with nothing but high quality entertainment to the Mullins Center.

LeBarron will not only be working with the Mullins Center. He will connect directly with UMass students by teaching Arena Management, a Sports Management class.

"I look forward to giving something back," he said.

Global Spectrum is the fastest growing firm in the public assembly facility management field with more than 40 facilities throughout the United States and Canada.

Construction hammers Five College Area

It's finally finished

Coolidge bridge opens to four-lane traffic

By Nate Walsh
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON, Mass. — Students returning to the Five College Area this fall may be pleasantly surprised to find that the construction of the Calvin Coolidge Bridge on Route 9, which acts as a pipeline into Northampton and on to Interstate 91, has finally been completed, freeing up the heavy traffic and delays that has plagued the highway in the past.

Construction began on the bridge in summer of 2001 by the state highway department and the Cianbro Construction Co. The project was intended to widen the bridge to four lanes and to refurbish its appearance and structural integrity. The project was expected to end in the summer of 2003 however it was delayed for almost a year.

"It did take us a little longer than anticipated, but we did do a little more work than we anticipated," said Chet Muckenhirn, Cianbro's project manager for the bridge.

During the work on the bridge, it was not uncommon for traffic to be backed up for miles, as motorists would pass through Hadley and into Northampton and I-91. UMass has been aware of the problems, making special note about the bridge construction in its directions to campus for new students and visitors since 2001. The campus community has waited for three years to witness the completion of the bridge and on June 25, waiting ceased as the ribbon was cut celebrating the opening of the completed project.

"The Coolidge Bridge has always been a dear part to all who have come in contact with it, and the fact that it is reopened lifts a heavy damper from the spirits of many," said Vincent Milburn, an undeclared sophomore.

Traffic rushes across Calvin Coolidge Bridge, top. Left, a sunny view of the newly-opened four lanes. Right, a large marble slab displays the bridge's namesake, former president Calvin Coolidge.

"I think it's great because now it's easier to access [Northampton stores]," said Jordan Hakkinen, a resident of Puffton Village. "It's totally sweet!"

However, this should not mean that the traffic problems have been solved for Route 9. There are a considerable number of cars traveling over the bridge and using the surrounding roads.

"I'm interested in having UMass students use public transportation," said Northampton Mayor Clare Higgins. "When I went to UMass, I used the bus."

The mayor told the Collegian the need for the two communities of UMass and Northampton to have a direct route to each other, as there is a sizeable amount of people moving back and forth daily.

UMass has cut a shuttle that runs between the two communities, which may be a problem for some, and contribute to future traffic.

The ribbon cutting festivities this past July included a parade of classic cars, which made their way across the bridge past spectators of all ages. Several dignitaries were on hand for the event, including the Mayor of Northampton Clare Higgins, and State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg, D-Amherst.

The bridge carries the name of the thirtieth president of the United States, however, not many people are aware that "Silent Cal" Coolidge, although born in Vermont, graduated from Amherst College with honors, was elected Mayor of Northampton in 1909 and died in Northampton in 1933.

UMass library project underway

By Megan Daley
Collegian Correspondent

$5.8 million worth of major renovations to the W.E.B. DuBois library that began over the summer will continue into the school year, say University of Massachusetts officials.

The concrete deck built around the library has been torn down and excavated so that waterproofing material can be put down to stop roof leaks, says Emily Silverman, Director of Library Development and Communication.

The new deck that will be erected will also have sloping sides, making it handicapped accessible. The work is being done by Gardner Engineering of Chicopee.

This renovation is the first step in a series that the library wishes to accomplish, says Silverman. Eventually, the "exterior renovations will be done and we can start on the interior ones."

The main floor of the library will get new carpeting and paint, but the physical updates will only be the start.

"We want to make a 'learning common' that will centralize a lot of the things from the library tower, like the O.I.T. labs. We want to give better access to the library resources," she said.

This second step of the library renovation will cost approximately $5 million.

Although the construction is ongoing, the library itself is fully operating.

"The main message that we want to tell students is that the library is still open," said Silverman. Temporary entrances are set up on the side of the library that faces the Student Union and on the side that faces South College.

For safety reasons, some parts of the library below the deck were off limits during the summer, but, for the most part, Silverman says that there is now "full access" to the facilities on that floor, including, reference, computer labs, cataloging, technical services, shipping and receiving, inter-library loan and periodicals.

When school starts, the library will operate on regular hours, with as little disruption to the students as possible, according to Silverman.

"The noisy part is done; the demolition work is pretty much completed," she said. "We've done all we can to make sure that students won't be inconvenienced by noise."

Silverman also encourages students who may be deterred from using the library because of the construction to use the library's website.

"It's better than ever," she said. The website, www.library.umass.edu, also features updates on the construction progress.

Repairs and renovations to the W.E.B. DuBois library are nothing new. Soon after it was first completed in 1973, bricks began falling off the building's façade, due to the designer's failure to take into account the effect that the weight of the books would have on the building, according to the UMass Amherst 1979 yearbook.

The library was closed down for general student use for a time and the old library, Goodell Library, was used instead. Excess books were stored in the new library and runners were employed to retrieve them if a student needed them.

The library renovations are just part of reconstruction that will be going on at UMass. Franklin and Berkshire dining commons will also be receiving renovations in the near future.

According to Ken Toong, Director of University Dining and Retail Services, plans for Franklin are "still on the drawing board" and architects and planning commissions are still meeting to discuss future improvements for Berkshire. At the time of this publication, arrangements regarding cost and start dates were still being made.

Top, an aerial view of the massive construction project. Above, a backhoe operator moves dirt around the library base.

of his presidency.

"In the heart of this great city, we saw tragedy arrive on a quiet morning," Bush said. "We saw the bravery of rescuers grow with danger. We learned of passengers on a doomed plane who died with a courage that frightened their killers."

In optimistic language reminiscent of Ronald Reagan's, Bush said: "Since 2001, Americans have been given hills to climb, and found the strength to climb them. Now, because we have made the hard journey, we can see the valley below."

He sought to project that optimism on an issue that remains a top source of anxiety for many Americans, the economy, and he said his tax cuts were responsible.

Edwards gets support those who are unfortunate and that have to make ends meet everyday.

"It doesn't have to be that way anymore," he said, "we can do this together, you and I. Hard work should be valued so we're going toward work, not just wealth."

More specifically, Edwards guaranteed several tax breaks to the middle class, including $1,000 healthcare tax break, $1,000 childcare tax break and a $4,000 tax break on college tuition.

"How?" Edwards asked a puzzled crowd, "We will keep and protect tax payers and roll back the tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans."

He also said that the two plan to raise minimum wage and finish the welfare reform."We're going to say 'no!' to those working full time and living in poverty, not in our America," he shouted, "hope is on the way because this is an America where everything is still possible."

On the path to the Presidency

On Thursday July 29, an enthusiastic and energetic Senator John Kerry saluted Americans and accepted his nomination for President of the United States, during the culmination of the entire convention.

"I'm John Kerry and I'm reporting for duty," Kerry saluted, " and I have one purpose – to make America stronger at home and respected around the world."

Kerry spoke about his family, and strong family values that can change the world.

"It's time for those who talk about family values to start valuing families, he said, "We believed we could change the world, and we did, but we're not finished, we're not, the journey isn't complete, the march isn't over, the promise isn't perfected and tonight we're setting out again and we're going to write the next great chapter of the American story."

Kerry accused the Bush administration for not telling the truth about leading America into war.

"It starts with telling the truth to the American people" he said.

"That is my first pledge – to bring trust and credibility to the White House. I will be a commander in chief who will never lead us into war."

The Massachusetts Senator continued to blame the current administration for waging war, raising taxes for the middle class, making healthcare unaffordable and taking away after school programs for children.

Kerry also said that the Bush administration is pessimistic and the reason for a struggling economy.

"There is nothing more pessimistic than saying that America can't do better," he preached, "we can do better and we will— we're the optimists."

Kerry continued with references to his runningmate's speech from the previous night and chanted with the crowd, "Help is on the way!"

He talked about the war in Iraq and he will use his tactics and knowledge from the war in Vietnam to wage this current crisis.

Kobe Bryant dismissed from rape charges

EAGLE, Colo. (AP) - The Kobe Bryant case collapsed Wednesday as prosecutors said they had no choice but to drop the sexual assault charge against the NBA star because his accuser no longer wanted to participate.

Bryant, whose trial had been days from opening arguments, responded with an apology to the woman who had accused him.

"Although I truly believe this encounter between us was consensual, I recognize now that she did not and does not view this incident the same way I did," Bryant said. "I now understand how she feels that she did not consent to this encounter."

With the parents of the 20-year-old alleged victim looking on, District Judge Terry Ruckriegle threw out the case under a deal that means no charges will be refiled.

District Attorney Mark Hurlbert told Ruckriegle the woman did not want to testify or otherwise participate in the trial. The woman's attorney, John Clune, said she has been through an extremely difficult time over the 14 months since she alleged she was raped, and was disturbed by a series of courthouse mistakes that included release of her name and medical history.

"It is in her sincere belief that when this case ends, she does not want to be brought back into the criminal process," Clune said.

"The difficulties that this case has imposed on this woman the past year are unimaginable."

The dismissal marks a stunning turn in the high-profile case against one the NBA's brightest young stars. For months, prosecutors had insisted they had a strong enough case to win a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt.

Instead, prosecutors dropped backed away after spending thousands of dollars and just days before opening statements were scheduled to begin on Tuesday. Jury selection was scheduled to wrap up this week.

Bryant, 26, has said he had consensual sex with a then-19-year-old employee of a Vail-area resort where he stayed last summer. Had he been convicted, the Los Angeles Lakers star would have faced four years to life in prison or 20 years to life on probation, and a fine up to $750,000.

Bryant, who still faces a federal civil lawsuit filed by the accuser that seeks unspecified damages, apologized to the victim "for my behavior that night and for the consequences she has suffered in the past year."

"Although this year has been incredibly difficult for me personally, I can only imagine the pain she has had to endure," said Bryant, who also apologized to her family, his family and friends and the citizens of Eagle.

Bryant said that while the civil case remains, that part of this case "will no longer be a financial or emotional drain on the citizens of the state of Colorado."

UMPD says cameras will cut crime

Gargano. "We will catch them."

Cameras are not new to UMass residential areas. Video cameras were installed to monitor the outside of buildings in Southwest in the late 1990's years ago under former chancellor David K. Scott, according to UMass Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor.

"I believe the [cameras] have been a success," said O'Connor. "You can't measure [the amount] of crime they've deterred, but they have deterred serious crime and suspects have been identified."

The new cameras were installed in three separate installations by Galaxy Integrated Technologies, Simplex/Grinnell, and ACP Engineering.

Besides camera installation, the $5 million in capital housing improvements provided new furnishings, painting, and other physical improvements to residence halls.

Violent raid on standoff

A father holds his son after escaping the separatists who took 1,200 people hostage in a school in Beslan, Russia.

More than 150 are feared dead

By Mike Eckel
Associated Press

BESLAN, Russia (AP) - Commandos stormed a school Friday in southern Russia and battled separatist rebels holding 1,200 hostages, as crying children, some naked and covered in blood, fled through explosions and gunfire. An official said the death toll could be significantly higher than 150.

Three of the separatist rebels were reportedly still blockaded in a school basement, trading fire with security forces. A Federal Security Service official said militants were still holding hostages.

Hours after much of the school was secured late Friday afternoon, a large explosion erupted from the school toward nightfall, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported.

Ten militants were killed in the violence, including nine Arabs, an aide to President Vladimir Putin said, according to the Interfax news agency. The Arab presence among the attackers would support Putin's contention that al-Qaida terrorists were involved in the Chechen conflict, where Muslim fighters have been fighting Russian forces in a brutal a war of independence for most of the past decade.

A hostage who escaped told Associated Press Television News that the militants numbered 28. The hostage, who identified himself only as Teimuraz, said the militants began wiring the school with explosives as soon as they took control.

The chaotic climax to the hostage standoff began when explosions collapsed part of the school roof and gunfire erupted from inside the building where the militants stormed the school Wednesday moring.

The militants kept the hostages in the sweltering gymnasium, refusing to let in food or water.

"They didn't let me go to the toilet for three days, not once. They never let me drink or go to the toilet," Teimuraz, the escaped hostage told APTN.

After the hostage-takers fled, more than 100 bodies were found in the gymnasium, some apparently killed when part of the school's roof collapsed in the explosion that prompted the Russian security forces to move in.

A Putin aide said the total death toll could be significantly more than 150 people. An estimated 520 people were wounded, health officials said. The regional health minister earlier reported that at least 218 children were wounded.

Aslanbek Aslakhanov, Putin's top aide on Chechnya, said security forces did not plan to storm the building, but were prompted to move when the hostage-takers set off explosions early Friday afternoon.

Russian soldiers rest as they encircle the seized school in Beslan, North Ossetia, Friday, Sept. 3, 2004. A hostage released from a provincial Russian school said there are at least 1,500 people being held there by armed militants, the Izvestia newspaper reported Friday, and a local legislator announced a similar figure challenging far-lower official numbers. (AP Photo/ Sergey Ponomarev)Witnesses said the militants opened fire on fleeing hostages and then began to escape themselves.

Gunfire rang out for hours as security forces chased hostage-takers, who split into small groups as they fled. Interfax and the ITAR-Tass news agency reported the three militants holed up in the basement may include the head of the group. Another group took refuge in a nearby house where tanks moved in.

Huge columns of smoke rose from the school. Windows were shattered, part of roof was gone and another part was charred. Commandos, residents and journalists scurried around the building and soldiers climbed inside through a lower floor window, all the glass missing.

People ran through the streets, and the wounded were carried off on stretchers. An Associated Press reporter saw ambulances speeding by, the windows streaked with blood. Four armed men in civilian clothes ran by, shouting, "A militant ran this way."

Soldiers and men in civilian clothes carried children to a temporary hospital set up behind an armored personnel carrier. One child had a bandage on her head, others had bandaged limbs. Some women fainted.

The children drank eagerly from bottles of water given to them once they reached safety. Many of the children were naked or only partly clothed because of the stilling heat in the gymnasium.

"I am helping you," a man dressed in camouflage told a crying girl. Women gathered around, trying to soothe her, saying "It's all right. It's all right."

A cameraman for the British network ITN reported seeing around 100 bodies in the gym. The correspondent for Russia's Interfax news agency reported that there were dozens of bodies in the school, including about 100 in the gym, and that some were killed when the building's roof collapsed from an explosion before the main assault began.

Sixty of the bodies in the gymnasium have been identified, said Valery Andreyev, the chief of the Federal Security Service in North Ossetia said.

Matthews and Co. perform sold out back-to-back shows

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

MANSFIELD — What are two surefire signs that summer is in full swing? The seemingly endless days of sun and sand, and the Dave Matthews Band back on the road again.

Matthews and his band of merry men, violinist Boyd Tinsley, bassist Stefan Lessard, sax-man LeRoi Moore and percussionist Carter Beauford embarked on a 47-date summer tour that began June 17 at the UMB Bank Pavilion in Missouri and will criss-cross the country until early September when the band joins the MoveOn PAC's Vote For Change Tour with such legends as James Taylor, Bruce Springsteen, and Pearl Jam.

The Northeast first played host to Matthews in early July, when he and his band mates hit the Tweeter Center in Mansfield for a two-night stand.

On July 6, Dave and Company took the stage just as the summer sun was setting in the distance. Diehard fans were anxious for the show to begin with rumors circulating that Matthews had been performing four entirely new songs on this tour. As soon as the lights went out the sold out crowd of almost 20,000 strong exploded and the band took their usual stroll on stage. They opened with several classic DMB tunes, "One Sweet World," "Best of What's Around," "The Stone" and "The Song that Jane Likes."

After "Jane," one of the new tunes, "New Song #4" made its debut. A haunting ballad, "New Song #4" was slow jam for the band with each player getting a chance to shine with mid-song jam session that lasted over 10 minutes. Following "#4" was fan favorite and DMB signature song "Crush," complete with the unavoidable sing-along. Matthew's raspy voice was in top form and was well showcased in "Crush."

"Rhyme and Reason," a song that is typically absent from DMB sets was up next followed by a second new tune, "Good, Good Time."

Following these two numbers was the song "Warehouse," known by fans for its intense jams. True to form, Tuesday's crowd was excited for "Warehouse."

Even "I Did It," from the band's often dismissed 2001 album, "Everyday," made an appearance in the set. "New Song #3", another new tune came next. The crowd responded well to the second serving of new material for the night. Reminiscent of older DMB work, "New Song #3" was both refreshing and familiar.

"Where Are You Going," off of DMB's most recent studio album "Busted Stuff," was a nice transition from new to old. The crowd was anything but low-key, despite the songs modest tone.

Matthews was in good form Tuesday, injecting his signature humor and his indescribable dancing and grooving that he is famous for into the show. During an intense version of "Jimi Thing," complete with a scat break, he quipped about how his "milkshake is better than yours." He then segued into another new song, a smooth and laid back "New Song #1" that complimented the gorgeous summer evening nicely.

The night's set was wrapped with an utterly insane version of "Tripping Billies," with the entire band letting loose. Strings were broken, articles of clothing went flying and the fans were going nuts. When the lights went out, the fans were screaming for more. Tiny flames from fans lighters illuminated the darkness of the Tweeter Center and there was a certain electricity in the air that was indescribable.

After yelling and cheering for about 10 minutes, the boys strolled back on stage for their encore which consisted of a tease intro into a yet another new song, "New Song #2" which was great addition to the current tour repertoire. Matthews and Co. sent their fans off to Dreamland that night with a rendition of "What Would You Say" in their heads.

On Wednesday night, the band felt and looked like a pair of your favorite worn-in shoes. The night was picture perfect; warm, slight breeze, just right for a concert. The boys opened the show with "Too Much," playing with the same intense energy from the previous night.

At Wednesday's show, the "new" songs officially received their names. "New Song #1" became "Crazy-Easy," "New Song #2" became "Joy Ride," "New Song #3" was renamed "Hello Again" and "New Song #4" was christened "Sugar Will."

The rousing opener was followed by classic DMB tune, "Granny," much to the delight of the second consecutive sold out crowd. "Don't Burn the Pig" was featured next, followed by "Sugar Will," which was even stronger than in the previous night's performance.

July 6 & 7

The mellow "Bartender" was up next, a tune that has quickly become a contemporary Matthews classic, joining the ranks of "Ants Marching," "Tripping Billies," "Lie in Our Graves," "Crash" and "Crush." Matthews's voice was again in pitch-perfect form, hitting all the falsettos effortlessly.

The summery and easy-going "When the World Ends" was a nice follow up to "Bartender" and got the crowd pumped again. An extremely strong version of "Drive in, Drive Out" was greeted with thunderous cheers as was the second newly named tune, "Crazy-Easy."

Band bassist Stefan Lessard had a sick solo segue into "Grace is Gone." He tried his hand at a lap steel and he, along with the rest of the band had the crowd eating out of the palms of his hands. A short and somewhat ineffective version of "Recently" followed next and then "Grey Street," which has become a live standard since appearing on "Busted Stuff," and even earlier from the unreleased "Lillywhite Sessions" with famed producer Steve Lillywhite.

Matthews performed a short intro to the newly named "Hello Again," which was even tighter than the night before and then it was an explosive rendition of "Ants Marching." Giving the previous night's "Tripping Billies" a run for its money. The crowd was going crazy and sang along so loud. They even drowned out Matthews for the most part. Boyd rocked out on his electric violin and Matthews did the two-step dance and shimmy that he is famous for.

After the wild rendition of "Ants," fans needed to take a quick breath, and Matthews delivered with a quiet yet powerful rendition of "Cry Freedom." Lighters flickered in the summer breeze across both the lawn and the pavilion, and fans slowly swayed in time to the bands performance.

The final new song, "Joy Ride" came next, followed by "Everyday." With the absence of a backup trio of women, sax player Leroi, along with constant DMB guest musician Butch Taylor on keys and the eager fans made "Everyday" the highlight of the evening. Dave and the crowd sang "Honey, honey ... come and dance with me," which sent chills down the spine. A crowd-pleasing rendition of "Stay" finished out that night's phenomenal set.

After much hootin' and hollerin,' the evening's encore was a die-hard Dave fan's dream come true. The boys in the band bid farewell to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts on a high note. They started off with an intense "So Much to Say," and then a short and seldom-heard "Has Anyone Seen the Bridge" segued into "Pantala Naga Pampa" that went directly in to a blazing version of "Rapunzel."

In an interview with Boston radio station WBCN earlier in the day, bassist Lessard told DJ Cali about possible producers and a possible release date for the band's next album. Big-shot producers like Pharell and Dr. Dre have been thrown around to produce the band's next studio release, as well as a release date as soon as this Christmas. A more likely date will probably be towards the end of winter 2005, with the band "doing other things" this fall after the concert tour concludes in mid-September.

Tweeter's two-night stand was proof that if you have never seen the band live, then you have never really heard the band at all. Dave, Stefan, Boyd, Carter and LeRoi deserve much thanks for making Mansfield, if only for two nights, "One Sweet World."

Ozzfest '04 fails to measure up to previous years

chandising and the constant hounding to blow money on trinkets made the event into a bazarre with live musical entertainment.

Though opening act Atreyu was unavoidably detained and missed their set, it was no big loss as, much like many of the other bands on this year's billing, they were just another up-and-coming band with only a small clutch of fans who could name a piece of their work without flipping over the CD jacket.

The negativity that manifested against bands such as Magna-Fi, Every Time I Die and Bleeding Through — though very merited by the latter bands — seemed to be a bit more hostile than a simple expression of the heavy metal spirit.

One of the rare gems of the second stage was the Jersey-based God Forbid. Fronted by a versatile vocalist, Byron Davis, with the dynamic guitar and back up vocals of brothers Doc and Dallas Coyle this band proved that though they were a bit unfamiliar with such huge performances they could still pull it off. Unfortunately, with such a similar group of bands surrounding their performance, it was a bit difficult to separate the unique qualities of their music from the unremarkable quantity of music from some of the other acts.

In an exclusive interview with guitarist/vocalist Doc Coyle The Daily Collegian asked about the widely rumored imminent break up of the band. Coyle said, "Yea we were having a bit of tension, you know, but we all took our little time out and things are better."

In regards to having a band mate who is also a sibling and how that has impacted their relationship he said, "We have our little fights every now and then but it is just stupid little shit. We are just like any other brothers."

Having been together for over six years now the members of God Forbid have seen conflict and experienced the friction of trying to make a name in the industry. It seems as though with Ozzfest being their first major tour they can only continue to climb there will definitely be more to hear from this band.

Alternating between half-heartedly throwing up their devil horns and doing a very good imitation of the sea kelp sway the crowed seemed drowsy at best, that is until Otep took the stage. The fiery blonde lead singer and band namesake Otep took to the stage with a giant rubber severed pig's head and her microphone. In her staggeringly sweet yet somehow disturbing voice she demanded to know just how much the crowd was willing to do for her. She asked, "Will you scream for me? Will you bleed for me?"

In that moment there seemed to be a spark of something like the old metal magic you hear about in the stories from veterans of the bygone golden age of the genre. It seemed as though were she to ask anything of us we would obey as she had snatched up all of our heartstrings and held our very lives as well as the grotesque prop.

Italian natives Lacuna Coil's performance was marred by sound equipment difficulties, making their usually difficult to decipher vocals a wash of incoherent shouts and muted mumbles. One must give them credit though: in spite of the problems they pressed on through a set that if not worthy of eternal memory was a very good effort.

Supposed lead band of the second stage Slipknot's performance was about as amusing as a Ringling Brothers show, lacking in the spirit put forward by some of their predecessors. Their usual surplus of drummers allowed members of the masked musicians free moments with which to spit on security guards, flip off the crowed and run around like maniacs. Though colorful and entertaining, one was left wondering when they were going to play some of the music that earned them their initial fans. I suppose we will just have to wait.

The main stage line-up was as one-sided as the second stage and seemed as though it was the result of some sort of game of booking roulette. A short set by Black Label Society set the bar very high for the following acts.

Superjoint Ritual, and Norwegian death metal band Dimmu Borgir tried but failed to really get any great response from the crowed. Though there was a good amount of laughing at Dimmu Borgir's lead singer Shagrath's expense; it seems as though a good portion of the crowed found his attempt at the guttural style of singing to be reminiscent of a certain member of a certain Lollipop Guild's voice.

Slayer, on the other hand, managed a good response for their performance, which was nothing less than could be expected from the seasoned musicians.

The true star of the evening was actually the second seat band, Judas Priest. The aging rockers seemed young again on stage in their gaudy yet practically trademarked leather attire. Vocalist Rob Halford, though wrinkled and bald, owned the stage, even making the mad dash after songs to do wardrobe changes and to bring his chopper on stage. The old metal magic vibrated the crowd and even those of us not old enough to know all the words were moved to belt out the ones we knew along with the band.

When they fled the stage after an encore the remnant vibrations had the crowed on edge to see Black Sabbath, as it surely would have to be a stellar performance. Alas, it was just a day for disappointments.

Vocalist Byron Davis, of New Jersey-based band God Forbid, performs at Ozzfest in July.

The ancient members of Black Sabbath took to the stage slowly, played out the classics as well as they had years ago but it was just an empty performance. Of course, Ozzy entreated the crowd several times with his appreciation and love for the fans but his energetic words were counteracted by the seemingly rigor mortis-riddled band members.

Though on a whole the festival was disappointing, it was not a complete flop. Maybe the golden age of metal has passed and we, who cling to the legacy of what was once a culture-driving genre, are grasping a sinking ship. There are those few and far between musicians who will bear the torch on or at least play the loudest and most defiant dirge ever played for a fallen empire. Then again there is always hope for next year.

The 'King' of Boston

Theatrical take on Disney classic hits Beantown stage

By Joe Piedrafite

Boston — "Spectacle: something exhibited to view as unusual, notable, or entertaining; especially an eye-catching or dramatic public display" That is how Merriam-Webster's dictionary defines the word spectacle.

That's also one of the numerous adjectives that both critics and audiences alike have used to describe Julie Taymor's dazzling stage production of the 1994 Disney animated classic, "The Lion King."

'The Lion King'

They say that good things come to those who wait and right they are. After five years of waiting Boston has finally been given the chance to play host to the stage production of "The Lion King."

"The Lion King" is basically an update on Shakespeare's "Hamlet," where young Simba witnesses the death of his father, Mufasa, and is convinced by his uncle Scar that he was the cause of his dad's demise. Simba runs away and Scar becomes the new king of the pride lands. After being away, Simba realizes that it was Scar who was responsible for Mufasa's death, and returns to regain the throne.

The animated film was groundbreaking in its use of integrated computer technology — most people remember sitting in the movie theater and being terrified along with Simba during the wildebeest stampede — along with hand-drawn animation. The stage production is also ground breaking with its innovative use of masks and puppetry to portray everything from exotic animals to the African savannah.

Director/designer Julie Taymor and co-designer Mark Curry created dozens of masks and puppets for the production, which are built around the characters' costumes. The actors portraying lions, for example, wear traditional African dress and exotic lion masks on their heads, so not to obstruct their faces. When the actors put their heads down, the mask comes

Live Incubus show proves to be 'Left' of the ordinary

By Nick Romanow

Providence — Much to the delight of fans all over New England, Incubus brought one of the most exciting and invigorating tours of the summer to the Dunkin' Donuts Center in Providence on July 2.

Incubus
Dunkin' Donuts Center
Providence
July 2

The tour, in support of the group's latest album, "A Crow Left of the Murder" marked a significant point in Incubus' career. While 2001's "Morn-ing View" saw Incubus dangling dangerously close to generic radio rock, the unique and spirited "A Crow," released last winter, signaled the return of Incubus as an imaginative and inspired juggernaut.

The tour's Providence stop found Incubus continuing to move in the right musical direction. The band started the show with a bang, taking the stage amidst a sea of noise and launching right into "Megalomaniac," the highly anti-Bush first single from "A Crow," and rarely letting up for the rest of the evening.

The band was brave enough not to rely on a greatest hits set and instead mixed some of their best songs from their past with a fairly large and welcome dose of songs from the new disc. They may have played the slightly boring, but not bad "Nice To Know You" but they followed it with the hard-rocking "Idiot Box," a track from the band's unheralded classic, 1997's "S.C.I.E.N.C.E." Lead singer Brandon Boyd and the rest of the group even took their most popular song, "Drive," and transformed it into a full-on trip-hop tune that breathed new life into the already outstanding, if unfortunately overplayed track.

Just as Incubus seemed to be as tight as they could get, they broke into the energizing "Vitamin," which then deconstructed into a lengthy, awe-inspiring battle between drummer Jose Pasillas and bassist Ben Kinney. The battle was impressive to such an extent that it had to be seen to be believed.

Perhaps the highlight of the entire night was the overall feeling of the band returning to their

'NCAA '05' offers a new take on the football game

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

In a groundbreaking move, sports gaming giant EA has finally decided to let XBox Live users in on the top online sports action. "NCAA Football '05" is the first game to allow XBox Live users to go online and play college football against other players. Oklahoma Sooners fans can dominate while University of Massachusetts fans probably don't want to take their team into an online game.

The game features plenty of college teams, including I-AA squads, so even Minutemen fans can beat on the Wildcats if their hearts desire.

On top of having a large range of teams and stadiums, you have the bonus mascot game option. This mode allows you to pit a team of mascots against another team of mascots, or an actual team. It is a good option to have to change the game up a bit.

The game has its downside though; the gameplay that Madden vets might expect out of an EA football game isn't up to par on this game. For a Madden player go to NCAA '05, the switch is not an easy one — there are no major teams to choose from and those 80 yard runs are not going to come as easily as they might in the pro games. The players run out of steam quickly and have a more realistic playing ability. Do not expect to make those long bombs every play or to even nail all of your passes. It just won't happen.

Any gamer that's used to the Madden style of play might become easily frustrated at all the dropped passes and the inability to run the football down the other team's throat. To win these games you need to switch up your plays and have good audible calls ready.

'NCAA Football 2005'
Playstation 2, X-Box, and Game Cube
Rated E
Grade B-

The more realistic game play can be frustrating at first, but as you adjust to the differences, the realism gives a different feel from its NFL counterpart. Your players will get beat up and can need a time out to give you a chance to boost their spirits, or let them catch a breather.

The fans also play an important role as they can help or hurt you. If you are home, the fans can give the opposing team a hard time, or vice versa, if you are away.

As far as the online play goes, it is slightly more player friendly than "Madden '05." Unless other gamers have followed the NCAA series, you should not be completely outmatched. Just be on the lookout for top-ranked teams like Oklahoma, as they are quite difficult to play against if you're not aware of the quality difference from team to team. You can also try searching for players in your region that might lead you to have some good games with a rival college.

"NCAA Football 2005" has an overall good solid basis for the first online EA game for X-Box Live users to toy around with. It enjoyed its time in the spotlight while it lasted, because it would later be in the shadow of the highly anticipated "Madden 2005."

"NCAA Football '05" is available at your local retailer for around $49.99 and is online for XBox via XBox Live [sold separately] and on PS2 Online.

Pixies, Cosby highlight of Mullins fall line-up

cert, recorded in the U.K. proves that The Pixies were even more alive on stage then on record. If anything the band is more intimidating on stage, despite the fact that they all look like average-joes. Witnessing the balding, stout Black on stage furiously strumming his acoustic and screaming his lungs out is even more powerful then just hearing it.

Now the country has been fortunate enough to be blessed with the chance to see this in person. The Pixies have been on tour in America and across the globe since the spring, but have yet to make it back to their home. Their stop at The Mullins Center on Nov. 30 marks their first New England appearance (their tour is scheduled to wrap with a string of Boston dates around Christmas) and signifies a great homecoming for the band.

"A Wave of Mutilation" is The Pixies new greatest hits cd.

"We are incredibly excited that The Pixies have chosen to return to the school where Frank Black and Joey Santiago initially came up with the idea for the band," wrote Brendan Leith in an e-mail interview. Leith is the talent buyer at Iron Horse Entertainment, the group putting on the show.

"There is just so much excitement surrounding this band now and it's great to see a critically-acclaimed band like The Pixies finally getting the attention they deserve.

"Ever since we heard rumors of their reunion, we had been inquiring about their tour plans and were very happy to hear they wanted to play UMass, out here in 'the sleepy west,' [a reference to the track 'UMass']," Leith said. "We do expect a tremendous crowd response and turnout. This is the hottest band on the planet right now, playing a historic hometown gig."

Mullins will get a taste of history in the making a month before The Pixies show when acclaimed comedian/actor/author Bill Cosby will come back to his old stomping grounds on Oct. 29. Cosby is very possibly UMass' most famous alumnus, first as an acclaimed stand-up comedian with a host of hit comedy albums, then as the star of leading multiple award-winning and hugely popular television shows. Cosby has gone on to star in many films and write a slew of best-selling books and continues to travel the country speaking and doing comedy.

Cosby most recently made news after making controversial comments about the black community, suggesting that African American people need to take more responsibility for their lives. Cosby has been known alternately as a color-blind comedian and a great black presence. "The Cosby Show's" family, the Huxtables were acclaimed for not relying on black stereotypes for comedy, but in contrary were also criticized for being 'too white'. Mr. Cosby has been known for family friendly comedy, but also for sharp, biting commentary.

Whatever Cosby brings when he returns to Amherst in October, it can be guaranteed the Mullins will be packed with fans waiting to see one of the most successful and acclaimed comedians of the past 40 years.

Tickets are now on sale through Ticketmaster and at the Mullins Center box office for Bill Cosby. Tickets for The Pixies are not yet on sale. No one at the Mullins Center was available for comment on either of these roots. Incubus did not play the Dunkin Donuts Center as the world-famous, chart-topping band they are, but rather as they were when they used to perform in small clubs, when rock radio and MTV wouldn't give them the time of day.

Though the stadium was only half-full (which very well might have been what kept them grounded) the band seemed to be in good spirits and was very focused on giving the crowd a great show.

Catering to the fans seemed to be the theme of the night as Incubus continued to gently balance their set for both hardcore fans and the fans that cared mostly about the singles. It was difficult to sit through the painfully lame lyrics of "Wish You Were Here" but the band more then made up for it by playing the rare track "Crowded Elevator" which, as front man and heartthrob for teenage girls all across this great planet Boyd pointed out, is not available on any of their albums.

The true star of the show was criminally underrated guitarist Mike Einziger who shined, especially in the shows final songs — a triumvirate, which featured very possibly the best tracks from "A Crow." The big-brother themed "Talk Show On Mute," "Sick Sad Little World" (which both on record and live features Einziger at his experimental and effects-heavy best), and "Made-For-TV Movie," featuring a truly soaring chorus.

The band could've easily quit then, already topping themselves many times over and doling out more highlights in one night then one would think was possible, but they still had a few more tricks up their sleeve.

During the encore the band broke into a cover of Soundgarden's classic "Black Hole Sun" that was performed with the perfect mix of skill and love. They topped themselves again by finishing up with "The Warmth." The crowd showed their appreciation for the great night by engaging in an arena-wide sing-along of the anthematic chorus. "The Warmth," one of the best songs from the band's catalogue and perhaps the song that best exemplifies Incubus as a band was a perfect way to end the night that saw Incubus jump from rock, to pop, to electronica, to funk, from fury, to love, to fear, to joy. The band traveled through many different sounds and emotions but was always having fun and always ended up optimistic.

Welcome Back to the Town of Amherst

We have enjoyed the slower pace of a summer in Amherst. But university and college students are what make Amherst the great place that it is to live, work and play; and we welcome you back to town – your town.

Relations between the Town and the University remain good, and University students have played a big part in good Town/Gown relations. Student activities such as arts and athletics have always provided culture and entertainment for townspeople as well as for members of the University community. Students have always provided many volunteer services, both on an individual and a group basis. The student firefighters and EMTs have provided vital services to the town for many years. The annual, spring "Into Amherst" day has been the most visible way for large numbers of students to provide services to the town you live in. We love the Community Service Learning program, and we know of other student services too numerous to mention. Some students have also participated on Town boards and committees and at Town Meeting.

The University administration, the Hadley District Court, and the Town of Amherst will continue our efforts to ensure that unfortunate incidents that have occurred in the past will not happen again. The Amherst Police Department is dedicated to protecting the safety of Amherst's citizens and visitors – including your safety. We hope that students can enjoy college life without serious alcohol-related incidents.

Transportation to and parking in and around downtown Amherst has been improved over the past few years, so we hope to see you downtown often. Please abide by parking regulations: we want your coins in the meters, not your dollars in the parking ticket envelopes. Better yet, use the buses that are paid for by your student fees, or use the bicycle lanes and racks downtown.

We are working with the SGA to reestablish a polling place on campus for the Presidential election, but the fate of those efforts is in the hands of the state legislature. In any case, we encourage you to vote in the September 14 state primary, the November 2 Presidential election, and the March 29 Town election. Call 256-4035 for more information.

Thanks again from the Town of Amherst, and have a good year.

Zack Braff takes on the 'Garden State' in directorial debut

COURTESY FOX SEARCHLIGHT PRODUCTIONS

Peter Sarsgaard, Natalie Portman and Zack Braff star "Garden State." The film, Braff's directorial debut, is a partially autobiographical look at the director's own life.

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

As the credits roll on Zach Braff's partially autobiographical "Garden State," the words of Frou Frou's "Let Go" ring out the theme of a film that is quickly becoming the newest testament to post-college anxiety.

"There's beauty in the breakdown," sings Imogen Heap. The beauty in the well-crafted "Garden State" is not in the breakdown of a character, but rather the breakdown of a drug-induced wall that has isolated him from the rest of the world since he was a child.

Braff, also the writer and director of the film, plays twenty-something Andrew Largeman, an actor living in Los Angeles with one remarkable role to his credit that leads to more quiet disdain than pride. When we meet him, he is coming out of an odd but telling dream to find out that his mother has died in an accident at his New Jersey home. To call that house his home, however, is a stretch. As Braff describes in his weblog for the film, Andrew has become "homesick for a place that doesn't exist."

Upon his mother's death, he decides to stop taking the numerous mood-dampening prescription medications that he has been on since he was 10 years old. This sets up the arc of his return home, where he is thrust back into a world he hasn't seen since departing for boarding school at age 16.

Largeman reunites with Mark and Dave, school friends who also happen to be his mother's gravediggers, waiting in the wings to finish the job. The scene provides a numbing irony, the emotions of the funeral being overlooked by the two young men waiting to get the burial over with so they can go to a party. Largeman tags along to the soiree, where he is immediately immersed in a brief synopsis of what he missed after he left: a drug and alcohol-laced party with no real reason. It's clear that even the ecstasy pill he takes just doesn't sit right in the drug "vacation" he's on. While the scene doesn't really move the plot forward any, it's an important anecdote to let us in on where Largeman is mentally and emotionally the doe-eyed neophyte in a world that even with its drab, static surroundings, is coming at him almost too fast.

The day after the party things begin to pick up as Andrew's visit to a neurologist for the short but painful headaches he's experiencing leads him to Sam (Portman), an outgoing girl who we know almost right off the bat will change his life. Her vibrancy is a total contrast to Largeman's slowly dissolving malaise and the end of the movie catches us up in the full-speed-ahead attitude she brings to life.

We learn some important background points to Largeman's story midway through which explains his decade-long stupor and the paradoxical relationship with his father, played to a subtle perfection by Ian Holm. Things kick into high gear when Mark (Peter Sarsgaard), attempting to acquire a special going-away present for Andrew, takes him and Sam on a circuitous journey through a hardware store, the interior of a hotel where less-than-respectable things are taking place, and finally to a quarry that never ends.

It is here that Largeman, at long last, lets go, taking a giant leap on his mission to become alive again. It also provides a high point for the love story between Andrew and Sam, which despite its adherence to convention is still touching because Sam's caring nature is the emotional relief that Largeman needs in the middle of his re-admittance to real life.

An intimate scene in his parent's fateful bathtub is a subtle emotional high point for Andrew. "This hurts," he says to Sam of his first contact with the grief over his mother's death that we haven't really seen until now.

What is so enrapturing about "Garden State" is that the main character's affliction is so easily identifiable by those in their 20s, whether they've been on serious medication or not. Largeman's waking coma might be from the lithium he's been taking since before puberty, but anyone who has ever felt even a little lost, unsure or disconnected from the world around him will recognize their own detachment in his glazed eyes. This is all thanks to a wonderful portrayal by Braff, who has managed to produce a self-written, self-directed, self-starring yarn that doesn't become too absorbed in Braff's own perception of himself.

'Garden State'
Directed by Zack Braff
Starring Zack Braff, Natalie Portman
Fox Searchlight
Rated R
109 mins.
Grade A

Sure, this is a vehicle for the young "Scrubs" star. Yes, his character does come around to find some happiness — and the girl — in the end, but throughout the movie his underlying pain becomes so weighty and palpable, its tough not to feel some connection.

Rounding out the cast, Sarsgaard is a very good post-teen slacker, accepting the inertia that has planted him in his house, smoking dope with his mother and becoming irate at her very young boyfriend. Holm, as mentioned above, brings a muted bitterness to the role of an unforgiving father, blaming Andrew for the wrongs done to his mother (only somewhat correctly). Some of the other background characters are interesting, including the very brief appearance of Method Man, who sets up one of the most uncomfortably funny moments in the movie.

Outside of Braff, though, Portman is the star, filling the screen with emotion every time she appears. The quality of her portrayal is not in the energy, though. It's in the temperance that keeps that energy from becoming too saccharine and bubbly. She pulls off enigmatic without being unnecessarily cryptic. When the role and the moment call for it, she is tender and human. Sam is a big part of the cataclysm that enlivens Andrew, and Portman does the job without being preachy or typical. It makes sense, since the part was written expressly for her.

The soundtrack, which Braff executive produced, deserves mention too. It is a perfect emotional undercurrent for the movie. Such sub-pop favorites as The Shins and Iron and Wine, in addition to appearances by Coldplay, Colin Hay, and Simon and Garfunkel, very correctly accompany Largeman's heart-wrenching journey.

Comparisons to "The Graduate" will be drawn, as they should. Largeman's early apathy is reminiscent of the quiet confusion experienced by Dustin Hoffman's Benjamin Braddock. However, the ultimate conclusion of Garden State is slightly more uplifting, as Largeman makes the decision to fight for the life he's never really had.

Taking Back Sunday defies all odds on sophomore effort

By David Pessah
Collegian Staff

As every sports fan knows, when a team makes major roster changes future success is never guaranteed. Fans can only wait and hope that the new team will achieve or surpass its previous level of success. Taking Back Sunday is a rock band, not a sports team, but when key members of the band dropped out following the breakthrough success of their first album "Tell All Your Friends," their fans found themselves in that same waiting game. Now, as a new season for Taking Back Sunday begins with the release of "Where You Want to Be," can this Long Island band repeat the success of "Tell All Your Friends," or will they leave fans longing for the glory days of the past?

Taking Back Sunday
'Where You Want to Be'
Victory

The verdict: the new roster delivers the goods. Old fans may be upset at first with the new lyrical structure and streamlined sound, but after a few listens they should be moshing like they were in the Warped Tour pit.

The band played musical chairs following the last riff of the "Takeover Tour" for "Tell All Your Friends." Two of the founding members, John Nolan and Shaun Cooper left the band under less than the best of terms to form another band, Straylight Run. The defections loomed large. Along with providing the background vocals on "Tell All Your Friends," Nolan had also written the bulk of the songs.

On the verge of a breakup, TBS was resurrected when new members Fred Mascherino and Matt Rubano joined the remaining three musicians: singer Adam Lazarra, guitarist Eddie Reyes and drummer Mark O'Connell. Many, including Nolan and his supporters, did not think Lazzara could write an album of comparable quality to "Tell All Your Friends." Lazzara took up the challenge on the album's first single, "To Hell With You and All Your Friends, It's On," and more than showed he can walk the walk. Lazarra's songwriting doesn't depict every hurtful detail of lost loves, jealousies and envy as Nolan's does, but the way he provides the overall theme and allows the listener to fill in the blanks is just as effective.

Taking Back Sunday return with a new line-up and a new lyrical direction with sophomore release, "Where You Want to Be."

The 11 songs of this album flow together almost seamlessly as ending screams blend into opening riffs. Mascherino's backing screams perfectly compliment Lazzara's soprano wail, making it easy to overlook Nolan's absence. As he belts out, "I got it baaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaadd" to end "A Decade Under the Influence," it's hard to believe one man could channel such an explosive scream.

The new members of the band prove their worth throughout. Musically, this album's pure energy surpasses that of "Tell All Your Friends." This is showcased best on "The Union," as the perfect combination of fiery guitars and pounding drums accompany Lazzara through the first verse before he belts his chorus of "I never made a scene, they came to be." That's when Rubano's bass line kicks in and the song never loses momentum.

The album's worst moment comes directly after, on the acoustic ballad "New American Classic." After the furiousness of "The Union," the slower acoustic guitar and strings of "New American Classic" temporarily stall the momentum of the album and just make you reach for the fast-forward button.

But the group regains its balance quickly, showing range and resilience over the final five tracks. On the album's final track, "... Slowdance on the Inside," Lazarra sings, "I got it, and I get it," and he does get it. This album will silence the naysayers, who didn't believe there was life after Nolan.

While you count the minutes until your next opportunity to see this band live, song after song will have you singing along. From the moment you press play it's "Where You Want to Be," and even though it's not the same as "Tell All Your Friends," you still should.

Michael Moore heats things up

Filmmaker puts the pressure on Bush with "Fahrenheit 9/11"

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

By the time you read this you will likely have come across at least 20 other reviews for Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9/11." Some of them will have praised his relentless quest for the truth and championed him as the savior of democracy. Others will have blasted his blatant bias and written him off as nothing more than a political parasite on level with those he professes to hate.

Yet they all seemed to have missed the point.

"Fahrenheit" is not meant to be an unbiased documentation of the Bush Administration and "Fahrenheit" doesn't claim to have the solution to our nation's political woes. Moore's film, much like his 2002 hit "Bowling for Columbine," isn't about giving answers to the masses. Its purpose is to get others asking the questions he himself poses throughout "Fahrenheit." Yet, unlike "Bowling for Columbine," Moore's latest release shows the director growing as a filmmaker. In this flick Moore has less screen time than in previous outings. This time around he lets the subjects: the current administration and the political climate of post-9/11 America, do the work for him.

'Fahrenheit 9/11'
Directed by Michael Moore
Starring Michael Moore, George W. Bush
Lions Gate
Rated R
127 mins.
Grade A

No matter which side of the potical spectrum you fall on it is hard to remain unmoved by the sentiment of "Fahrenheit." True, a large part of the film's efforts are focused on ousting George W. Bush from office, but beyond that the movie does something more. Moore's direction lends a sympathetic edge to the movie and the filmmaker himself is at moments visibly moved by the power of "Fahrenheit's" subject matter. Interviews with Lila Lipscomb, whose son joined the Army with her blessing and was shipped off to Iraq are heartbreaking. Without saying anything outright, Moore seems to illustrate the innanity of troops in Iraq, and though many viewers will relate to the feelings of having someone they love overseas, even those who do not share that experience will send their hearts out to Lipscomb.

For much of the Bush-hating public, it is hard to believe that two hours staring at his face could ever be enjoyable, but Moore masterfully uses the footage of "Dubya", Rumsfeld and even Britney Spears in an entertaining way. As angry as "Fahrenheit" may make some viewers, it also elicits more than a few laughs, and Moore does it gracefully. A clip of Pop-princess, Spears proclaiming, "we should trust our president in every desicion he makes," is not thrown in for cheap laughs, although the theater eruppted at the sight of it. Spears's remark serves a duel role, both to lighten the mood of an otherwise intense political lambasting, and also to perfectly prove Moore's point. The George W. Bush Spears speaks of is much like the speaker herself, nothing more than an image created by the media.

And just as Moore's camera can show his sympathetic side, it can also capture the utter absurdity of the situation in Iraq and the Bush administration as well. A segment featuring military recruiters soliciting teens at a "poor mall" in Moore's hometown Michigan doesn't have to work hard to make the recruiters come off as jokes. They do that easily themselves. Footage of embedded troops likening battle to Nintendo games balances out the sobering vision of a Christmas in Iraq.

And of course, "Fahrenheit" has the luxury of built in comic relief. The main focus is after all, George W. Bush. His antics, already absurd on the evening news, are downright amusing in "Fahrenheit." As angering as it is that it took Bush around seven minutes to respond to the news that "America was under attack," the sight of a middle-aged man absorbed in a children's book about a pet goat is hilarious enough to stop viewers from storming the Whitehouse in a rage. A montage of the President's many holidays in his first nine months as president set to the catchy Go-go's track "Vacation." is perfection.

But "Fahrenheit" is not perfect. Viewers may find themselves exiting the theaters with a feeling of being incomplete. This imperfection is not one of Moore's doing, but an unfortunate side effect of making a historical film in the midst of the events. Moore does not have the luxury of hindsight and therefore the ending of "Fahrenheit" brings no closure to its viewers; there is no 'ah-ha' moment, no easy answers. This lack of closure doesn't detract from the movie though; it only serves to strengthen the filmmaker's message. The unrest that is stirred within "Fahrenheit" viewers has been channeled into at the very least, increased political discussion among family and friends. It seems that Moore's goal to expose the Bush Whitehouse's lies has also mobilized the country's two most powerful weapons, mainstream media and free speech, in an attack against the current president.

What happens come November is anyone's guess. "Fahrenheit 9/11" cannot control the outcome of the election, but the film has certainly put the heat on Bush.

2004: The summer of the big-budget blockbuster

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

It would be hard to imagine a run of summer blockbusters that could be worse than last year's string of soulless money trains. After the commercialized black holes of "The Hulk" and "Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle" and "The Matrix Reloaded" and "Bad Boys 2" and "The League of Extraordinary Gentleman" and "Lara Croft Tomb Raider: The Cradle of Life," I wanted to crawl out of the darkness of the movie theater and seek out something more life-affirming to do, like mowing a lawn or trimming my fingernails.

Watching Hugh Jackman going to battle with a very fake-looking CGI Dracula in May's "Van Helsing," I had the sinking feeling that the Hollywood cheese machine was far from finished turning out rancid piles of limburger. To my surprise, I was only about half right.

Summer 2004 may go down as the first in several years in which the clockwork of blockbuster spectacle managed to be as entertaining as it was costly.

No better movie signified this sea change than Spider-Man 2. Sam Raimi's jaw-dropping follow-up to the comic book mega-hit. Now that the story is past the origin stage (deftly rendered over the opening credits) we can settle in and watch Spidey swinging from skyscraper to skyscraper with gymnastic ease and still plug into the central contradictions of the character: he's a savior who can barely hold himself together. Raimi couldn't have found a better actor to embody Peter Parker's bookish woundedness better than Tobey Maguire. Maguire is joined by Alfred Molina, who gives the tentacled villain Doc Ock the sort of tragic weight that Willem Dafoe's Green Goblin lacked in the original. "Spider-Man 2," for all its high-flying gloss, is a genuine human drama and one of the best superhero films of recent years.

Which is something that can't be said about Catwoman, that dankly awful hairball of a superhero action film. Halle Berry gets to strut, purr and sashay with a sexy feline playfulness, and she's easily the best thing on the screen. But whenever she's not playing Catwoman — whenever the movie gets around to the plot — it turns dreary and inept. I think the director, a one-named wunderkind by the name of Pitof, imagined a teasing and campy adventure, but this film is too flat-footed and cheap to qualify.

Most film comedies nowadays are too juvenile to be funny, but there has to be something said for a (rare) good, lowdown laugh. Ben Stiller is a master at playing the role of the unaware macho narcissist and he gives a juicy caricature in the anarchic sports comedy Dodgeball: A True Underdog Story, a spitball (and groin kick) in the face of mushy, cheesy up-with-losers sports films. Will Ferrell's uneven newscaster satire Anchorman may sag like a movie made from a TV sketch, but it's plethora of weird, woolly skits (a subtitled bear-dog conversation, a bloody back-alley rumble between rival sutations) and the scene-stealing stupidity of Steve Carrell offers a good dose of belly laughs, even if Ferrell's Ron Burgundy isn't interesting enough a character to center the film.

Both the inadvertently racist urban "Airplane" rip-off Soul Plane and The Wayan's brothers puerile gender-and-race swap comedy White Chicks lacked the biting wit that Dave Chappelle displays on a weekly basis, but those cinematic blunders can (and should) be ignored in favor of the summer's funniest film, Harold and Kumar Go to White Castle.

I must admit I thought that this stoner road odyssey, about a pair of ethnically notable potheads (one's Asian, the other Indian) heading off to the mecca of the titular burger chain would be an odious ramble through gross slapstick and witless stereotypes. The movie actually turns out to be a smart ramble through gross slapstick and witless stereotypes, with a charismatic pair of stars who possess the intelligence lacking in many of their teenflick peers.

Troy is basically "Homer for Dummies," and while it will never be a great film, it is a good one, with a series of exciting fight sequences making up for the baroquely wooden dialogue. The same can be said for the clanking medieval armor of King Arthur, a film in which the sword and sandals derring-do almost displaces the musty, moldering feel of the script. M. Night Shyamalan's The Village may have been a quieter period piece than those films, but Shyamalan's gift for wringing spooky atmosphere from virtually nothing deserts him here; the film has all the fear and mystery of an exploding balloon. I wanted to be wrapped up in Shyamalan's mood, but "The Village" is too shallow and ponderous to scare.

Science fiction has always been one of the biggest staples of the summer, and sci-fi geeks got not one, but five films to chew over. I actually enjoyed the Hallmark card sentimentality of The Day After Tomorrow, a world-freezes-over disaster epic that's more about father-son bonding than actual disaster. Will Smith grinned and wisecracked his way through the faux sci-fi noir of I, Robot, a plastic us-versus-robots thriller that felt more like an ad for an iMac than a serious techno-intellectual exploration (though, honestly, the film had it's moments). I enjoyed the mechanical button-pushing of Alien vs. Predator, even if the film is as soulless and robotic as a blockbuster can be. And the inevitable Predator and Alien face-offs are enough to get the geeks to salivate. All these films are still better than Vin Diesel's latest attempt to establish his star, The Chronicles of Riddick. Diesel glowers his way through this half-baked sequel to the taut 2000 thriller "Pitch Black," but the movie is dank and glum, and filled with the kind of pretentious "epic" dialogue that scifi turkeys are made of. The Stepford Wives is more comedy than sci-fi, but it has an effervescent wit that only disappears in the weak finale.

Notably, it was an adult summer at the cinema. We've had everything from Michael Moore's controversial, provocative op-ed documentary, Fahrenheit 9/11, which is funny, moving, angering and everything a film is supposed to be, to the tragic domestic drama of The Door in the Floor featuring outstanding, Oscar-worthy work from Jeff Bridges and Kim Basinger. Matt Damon returned as Jason Bourne in the thrilling, slick Bourne Supremacy and Tom Cruise showed his range (and dark-side) in Michael Mann's electric crime thriller Collateral. The Manchurian Candidate was a surprisingly stirring (if overlong) remake juiced by indelible performances from Denzel Washington and Meryl Streep. I wanted to like Steven Spielberg's The Terminal, but the story of a foreign man trapped in an airport due to a bureaucratic snafu was played for heartwarming laughs when it should have been played for a tangled, Kafka-esque black comedy, and was all the weaker for it.

There wasn't much in the way of romance this summer, at least if you counted on films like Little Black Book, handily the summer's worst film, featuring an even more annoying, goggle-eyed turn from Brittany Murphy than last year's "Uptown Girls." I adored the chemistry between Ryan Gosling and Rachel McAdams in the lovely The Notebook, and even more so the chemistry between Ethan Hawke and Julie Delpy in Richard Linklater's Before Sunset, a movie that celebrates the erotic pull of conversation. But I felt that the urban romance Breakin' All the Rules, was a middling affair indistinguishable from "Two Can Play That Game," "Deliver Us From Eva" and a dozen other films, most of which probably starred either Morris Chestnut or Gabrielle Union.

For teen audiences not interested in asinine jokes or expensive explosions, there were a couple of indie comedies to check out. Saved! is a religious satire that takes aim at fundamentalism yet never dismisses the faith, and features a strikingly good young cast that includes Jena down to cover their face, giving the illusion of an animal. The actor playing Zazu controls the bird like a puppet, as does the actor playing Timon. The actors playing Pumbaa and the hyenas however are completely enveloped in their costumes with only their heads visible to the audience.

The design and lighting for the show is stunning and that can be attributed to Richard Hudson and Donald Holder. The focal point of the set is Pride Rock, which rotates above and below stage with the greatest of ease. Most of the actors in the production are also part of the scenic element of the show as well as being part of the ensemble. At one point early in the show, the audience sees Mufasa and young Simba in what appears to be the grassland and once Mufasa and Simba leave stage, the grass appears to rise and we see that the grass is actually actors with pellets of grass on their heads, and are wearing grass skirts.

Another particularly effective design sequence in the show comes during the wildebeest stampede, where it looks like the wildebeests are actually coming towards you.

During "Can You Feel the Love Tonight?" the brilliant colors of the flora of the African savannah surround Simba and Nala and thanks to Garth Fagan's modern choreography, an aerial ballet is performed above stage while Simba and Nala realize their love for one another.

The most memorable part of the show comes at the very beginning, during "The Circle of Life." Rafiki appears on a bare stage and gives her signature cry and the sunrise over the savannah slowly begins, as a giant paper sun rises in the background with giraffes and jaguars gracefully crossing the stage. In the next instant there is a parade of animals down the aisle of the theater with everything from birds to rhinoceroses and elephants. With the sun high in the sky, Pride Rock rises and the animals converge at its base, ready to praise the newborn Simba and strike a tableau at the end of the song that sends chills down theatergoers' spines.

Elton John and Tim Rice, who wrote the Academy Award-winning score for the film also contributed to the musical and new songs were added by director Julie Taymor and African musician Lebo M., who was also an original cast member of the show. Taymor and Lebo M. added a host of songs to John and Rice's pre-existing songs, including a comic number for the hyenas "Chow Down," the ensemble song "He Lives in You" and an 11 o'clock number for Simba that brings the house down, "Endless Night." The Broadway production of "The Lion King" has an authentic African feel to it, with numerous African rhythms, chants and muskal instruments used in the musical's score.

The cast for the Boston premiere of "The Lion King" is top notch with standout performances from Dan Donohue as the evil Scar and Futhi Mhlongo as Rafiki. John Plumpis and Ben Lipitz are hilarious as Timon and Pumbaa, Simba's sidekicks, and Mark Cameron Pow has the perfect blend of neuroticism and silliness as Zazu. Lisa Nicole Wilkerson turns in a subtle and effective performance as Nala, as does Thomas Corey Robinson who plays the powerful Mufasa. James Brown-Orleans, Jacquelyn Renae Hodges and Wayne Pyle are a stitch as the trio of hyenas, and Brandon Kane and Calicia Wilson are absolutely adorable as young Simba and Nala. The real find in this cast of overwhelming talent is Alan Mingo Jr. in the role of Simba. Played with both style and grace, Mingo gives Simba a heart and soul that is extremely powerful in a performance that is not to be missed.

When "The Lion King" opened on Broadway in the fall of 1997, it was greeted with nearly unanimous acclaim. It soon became one of the hottest tickets in town with buyers purchasing tickets months, even years in advance. It was nominated for 11 Tony Awards in 1997 and won six, including Best Musical, Best Choreography (for Garth Fagan) and the Triple Crown in the design awards (Costume Design, Lighting and Scenic Design). Julie Taymor also became the first woman ever to win Best Director of a Musical and only one other woman has won the award since. Susan Stroman in 2001 for Broadway's other uber-musical, "The Producers." "The Lion King" is still playing to sold-out crowds each night in New York.

It seemed only natural that a tour would follow, and Boston would no doubt be one of the stops. A national tour did materialize as well, with engagements in Toronto, Los Angeles and London, but Boston was not one of the initial stops on the tour. In fact, it has almost taken five years for the tour to finally make its way to Boston.

Entertainment conglomerate Clear Channel purchased the crumbling Opera House on Washington Street in the theatre districted and performed a multi-million dollar renovation to the decaying venue. When it opened in July for the premiere of "The Lion King," it was restored to all its original grandeur. Other high profile productions have already booked the Opera House, including a return engagement of the long running "Phantom of the Opera" and beginning with the 2005 holiday season, the Boston Ballet's classic production of "The Nutcracker" will make the Opera House its permanent home.

Tickets are a pretty hard find, especially for weekend and holiday performances. Best bets are weekdays or try day-of sales at the Opera House box office. Tickets can be purchased online at www.ticketmaster.com or by calling 617-931-2787. Also, you can check out www.lionking-boston.com for more information about the show, playing now through December 26.

A friend of mine spent six weeks in Botswana this past summer and I'm willing to bet that the experience and animals he saw in that six weeks were the same as what I saw in the span of about two and a half hours. Okay, so maybe that's a bit of a stretch, but for me "The Lion King" is about as close to the African savannah as I'm going to get and to tell you the truth, that's fine with me.

The stage version of the Disney classic, "The Lion King," features new songs not in the film.

Brooches, boots and more: A preview of what's hot this fall

By Monique Jemmott
Collegian Staff

September marks the start of many things to many people. Apple picking season, football, and back to school are all synonymous with the first month of fall. And for all slaves of fashion, fall begins one of the most amazing times for fashion and trends.

Not too hot and not yet too cold, the fashion-conscious are free to do what they will with their imaginations and variations of fall's runway looks. The sky being the limit, nothing is taboo. The campus scene tends to differ.

Oftentimes I, like many college students across the continental U.S, pay less attention to the runway and more attention to the books, only scratching that fashion itch on the weekends. The week's wardrobe (despite the oaths and promises made to oneself at the beginning of the semester) consists largely of jeans, sneakers, and sweats, but like a true "slave to the big 'F,'" the itch never goes away.

The scratch to this itch comes in the form of some of this fall's top trends and more importantly, how to get them without breaking those college-sized piggy banks. With trends that are ever changing, it is not only wise, but also beneficial in the long run to hunt down bargains for those here today, gone tomorrow trends. Unless of course you have a steady supply of cash and in that case feel free to splurge!

Ponchos Please!

What better way to set off that perfect pair of jeans and shoes than a cozy poncho? It's the answer to days when effortless style is preferred. You can find them in all colors and textures from wool for outerwear, to lighter fabrics to be worn as a shirt for an evening out on the town (or uptown in this case). Ponchos are available in just about any department or specialty store for whatever price range fits your fancy. You can also tap into your inner designer and pick up some fabric in your favorite print and get to cutting!

Color Complex

Across the entire scope of this fall's fashion, the biggest trend is color. Whether it's a colorful coat, hat, or handbag, the rainbow is back. Think skittles for your wardrobe.

Legs! Legs! Legs!

Tired of covering up those stems? Put your best leg forward in colored and textured tights. Search your local department stores for fishnets, herringbone and tons of colors in tights from brands like Huc ($12.50 - $18.00) and Nine West ($13- $20).

Return of the "UGG"

Love em' or hate em', these luxury sheepskin boots made their debut last fall and became as much of a winter staple as a warm winter coat. And their back again to claim their place as a must have. While the original Ugg can put a serious dent in the pocket at $130-$160 a pair, many other retailers have taken the hint and have armed themselves with more affordable versions of the boot and plenty of stock as to avoid the three-month waiting lists of last fall. Check out places like Target who carry the boots in the newest colors such as lilac and powder pink for a mere $19.99.

The Brooch Factor

You've seen them in your grandmother's jewelry box and on your fifth grade teacher's coat. But now they're creeping their way onto the fashion radar – brooches and pins. They're feminine and classic. Use them to jazz up an everyday jean jacket or on a soft-colored cardigan for added glitz. Available in many departments stores, accessory shops, and even shoe stores.

Boston – Many fans knew that indie-rock legends Dispatch were calling it quits in order to pursue solo efforts, but few could have guessed more than 110,000 people would show up at their farewell concert.

Dispatch, comprised of Chad Urmston, Pete Francis and Brad Corrigan, formed in 1995 as the Wood River Bandits. The friends played their first show gig in a dorm room while attending Middlebury College in Vermont. The unsigned trio has since released ten albums and plans to release a final recorded version of the Hatch Shell concert in November. They have also played shows at such grandiose venues as The Fillmore, New York's Roseland Ballroom and The FleetBoston Pavilion.

Until the epic event on July 31 at the Hatch Shell, Dispatch's record largest crowd for a live event was just over 8,000 people, at a radio event held in Chicago. Fans stretching from all parts of the world came to say goodbye to a band many felt they knew personally.

Some diehards from distances as far as Italy, Mexico, Portugal and Australia trekked to Boston to what is now legend in Dispatch's brief history.

As the day opened, hours before the event even kicked off, fans scrounged to get even just one piece of memorabilia from the event. A record 12,000 Dispatch t-shirts were brought to the concert in expectance of an equal number of fans. To the band's delight, the t-shirt stock had been depleted before the band was able to storm the stage.

"We don't know what to say," Urmston said as he took the stage. "Except, how the heck did you get here?" The crowd erupted in a long stint of cheers that seemed to render the band mates even more speechless for a moment. The band shared a half smile, half jaw drop that resembled Charlie Bucket the first time he saw the Willy Wonka Factory.

Dispatch
MSC Hatch Shell
Boston
July 31

The show, which will be the focus of a DVD to come out in October, caught a great deal of the day's unexpected absurdity. Fans marching in from every direction even caught the Boston Police Department by storm, forcing them to shut down Storrow Drive for a portion of the day.

Despite the action, all of the people, all of the peddling and filming, all of the reminiscing and tear-jerking disappointment that the band was no longer to perform, the day went off without a hitch. Many troopers who braved the last Phish concert, nearly a month later in Coventry, Vt., probably wished they had as pleasant an experience.

Dispatch tacked a little extra fuel onto their last show with a three-hour performance that rivaled the likes of mythic souls like Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young. The range of songs teetered from strong Phish-influenced tunes like "Bulletholes," to the light and airy acoustic pop sounds of songs like "Carry You".

Fans seemed entranced by some of the classic tunes such as "Elias," an almost folk-infused jam song that may have more lyrical substance than anything else in the Dispatch catalogue.

Late in the set, the band serenaded the crowd with more reggae-touched versions of Dispatch classics such as "Mission" and "Outloud."

The band dedicated an ambitious version of "Bats in the Belfry" to the few daring fans that decided to climb tree branches to sneak a better view over the colossal crowd that preceded them. It did not seem that the branches were guaranteed to hold the amount of stick-in-the-muds that fought for spots, but that thought did not seem to deter many.

"You all confirmed what we always thought was true, that Dispatch isn't about 3 guys playing music anymore," Urmston said in a written statement released on the band's website subsequent to the concert. "This band is yours."

Each song was echoed by the same candor in lyrics that was the very mission of the band. Throughout the entirety of their nine-year stint under the name Dispatch, the band made sure that fans knew their passion was in the music, the joy of it in its most pure form. Believe it or not, CD profits, concert gain, and merchandise sales were all put back in to running the machine called Dispatch. Notice that there has never been an MTV Cribs with the three flashing their rims or the rocks that they got.

Multiple times as the show drew to a close, the crowd would break into loud, emotional chants of "Don't break up! Don't break up!" Despite the pleas all the members maintain that they will continue to pursue solo efforts and projects that will not be under the name Dispatch.

The waves of hot, exhausted, emotional and screaming fans exalted for one last tune. Time, place, and circumstance seemed to be ignored for just one moment to Dispatch as they broke into their final version of what is possibly considered their most celebrated song, "The General." Crying and hugging were allowed for a few final moments in a day that Brad Corrigan said "demonstrated the sheer power of peace and togetherness among 110,000 people. We were all sharing the beauty of life, music, and the pure joy of being alive."

Movies of summer get mixed review

Malone, Macualy Culkin, Mandy Moore and Patrick Fugit. Napoleon Dynamite, however, is a dreary nerd-com that wants us to laugh at its hapless characters rather than with them; if there was the slightest hint of affection in this smug disaster than there might have been a few actual laughs.

But the audiences most cheated this summer were the kids. Shrek 2 had its share of laughs, but it was never as charming as the original. The clichés piled up swiftly in the unnecessary sequel The Princess Diaries 2: Royal Engagement, which had none of the charm, wit and exuberance of the original. Hollywood poured millions into trash like Garfield: The Movie and Thunderbirds, but those films were awful — one a dim, laugh-free joke, the other a gaudy and clunky "Spy Kids" rip-off. A Cinderella Story may have continued Hilary Duff's reign as teen queen and it may have been better than rival Lindsay Lohan's "Confessions of a Teenage Drama Queen," but Lohan also made "Mean Girls," a far funnier film than this sappy, if wholesome, dud. The best kids films this summer were Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban, a more artful version of the beloved books than the first two films (which were nothing more than commercial franchise fodder,) and Two Brothers, a lovely, picturesque and underappreciated drama about the lives of two sibling tigers that had more warmth and humor than some more expensive films ever could imagine.

"Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban," the third installment in J.K. Rowling's Potter series, breathes new life into a series that up until now has survived mainly on childish whimsy.

"Azkaban" picks up where the previous story, "The Chamber of Secrets," left off. The villain this time around is Sirius Black (Gary Oldman). Black was convicted for the murder of Harry's parents and now he has seemingly returned to finish the job by eliminating Harry.

Black chooses the wrong time to go after Harry. In "The Sorcerer's Stone" and "The Chamber of Secrets," the boy wizard was a lost soul, a confused boy still adjusting to the world of Hogwarts. By now, however, Harry has grown confidence and an attitude. This change mirrors a change in the overall mood of the film, as well.

The first two "Potter" films were lighter and fluffier, geared more towards a younger audience. In keeping with the evolution of the book series, "Azkaban" has matured into a sophisticated experience, both in content and in presentation.

It was rather impressive seeing the young trio of actors at the forefront work so well with their adult counterparts. Over the course of the three films, Harry, Ron and Hermione have matured right in front of our eyes, so too have Daniel Radcliffe, Rupert Grint and Emma Watson. The three have grown considerably as actors since the first "Potter" film debuted in 2001.

New to the mix are Professor Lupin (David Thewlis) and Professor Sybil Trelawney (Emma Thompson). Both add new depths to the film and are welcomed additions to the cast.

The most crucial addition, however, is Michael Gambon. He had the insurmountable task of replacing the late Richard Harris, in the role of Hogwarts headmaster Albus Dumbledore. Gambon knew he could not "replace" Harris, and doesn't even try. Instead, he brings his own flair to the role, making it his own. He wanted to bring a sense of humor to the character and make it a lighter, gentler role and he succeeds at keeping the integrity of Dumbledore, while making the character fit into his own acting style.

The computer-generated imagery in "Azkaban" is quite impressive. The "Potter" films have always looked good, but this time around it was particularly important for the effects to be strong in order to capture the film's darker, scarier mood. The film is shot perfectly, illuminating the bright colors of Hogwarts, but adding in the dreary, sinister tones when needed.

Director Alfonso Cuaron, best known for his work on the remarkable and beautiful film, "Y Tu Mama Tambien," does a very commendable job with "Azkaban." In interviews since the film's release, Cuaron has said that he had extra motivation to make this film special, given that he is a fan of the "Potter" books. This point can be seen several times throughout the film, as small, seemingly insignificant bits and pieces from the book are thrown in. While it may not seem like much of a big deal, adding those little tidbits from the book provide a special treat for diehard "Potter" fans.

It's hard to evaluate "Azkaban" alongside the first two "Potter" movies. It will still entertain the younger audiences, but is finally starting to turn into a series that adults can enjoy as well. That may be the biggest achievement of all.

When I saw this film, I sat two rows in front of a large contingent of younger viewers, all decked out in their "Potter" attire. One kid had slicked blond hair, one had a huge Hagrid beard, and one had a lightning bolt drawn on his forehead with magic marker. Now, I doubt these kids picked up on the subtle nuances that self-proclaimed know-it-all film buffs like myself claim to have picked up on. What they did realize, however, is that the film succeeded at combining humor, special effects and wholesome entertainment with a story that people of all ages can enjoy.

And in the end, who can ask for anything more?

What to expect from this section

Mike Marzelli

For many, following sports serve as a simple pastime, but for others a distinct passion. The bond a fan shares with his or her team of choice is an unbreakable one – one so strong that it is often defines who you are and becomes a part of everything you do.

I count myself as one of these folks, and I do so openly. I'm a born and bred New Englander who survived Aaron Boone, but just barely. I count February 3, 2002 as the happiest day of my life, and I display a replica No. 6 Bill Russell jersey on the wall of my apartment, right next to the Bruins black and gold.

Since coming to the University of Massachusetts, I've learned to live and die with the Minutemen as well. While others scoff at the thought of I-AA football or laugh at the mediocrity of the men's basketball program of late, I've never missed a game, albeit as a fan or a member of the media. Why? Because I love sports. I love my school and I consider it very much my heathen duty.

Why am I telling you this? Well, because in my first year as sports editor of this fine publication, it's exactly what I should be hiding. I've always dreamed of becoming a sports writer, and I firmly believe that it is what I was placed on this planet to do.

Because of this, I realize the need to be impartial and fair as my staff and I bring you the year in UMass athletics, right here on these very pages. My goal for this section is to impart my aforementioned passion for sports into my own writing and that of my writers, and to do so in an informative, focused and professional manner. My rooting interest will only show up in my desire to get a story, and never in my coverage of that story.

There will be times this year when you may not agree with what we say, what we haven't said or how we say something, and I realize that and welcome it. The Collegian is your college newspaper, and we are here to give you what you want to read. I know there are those of you out there who are just like me, and I want to hear from you. I want to know what you want to see in the Collegian, and why you want to see it. This is my space, but it's also yours and I'm going to do my best to fill it with credible work that you'll want to read. After all, it's what I'm here for.

So for all the coverage of Minuteman athletics you'll ever need, keep it right here. The Collegian will be on campus every day there's class, and in many cases will be there more often than you will.

To the upperclassmen, welcome back to good 'ol ZooMass. And to the incoming freshman, good luck, it's gonna be a long strange trip – one the Collegian covers every step of the way.

DON BROWN TAKES THE REIGNS OF THE DEFENDING ATLANTIC 10 CONFERENCE CHAMPIONS

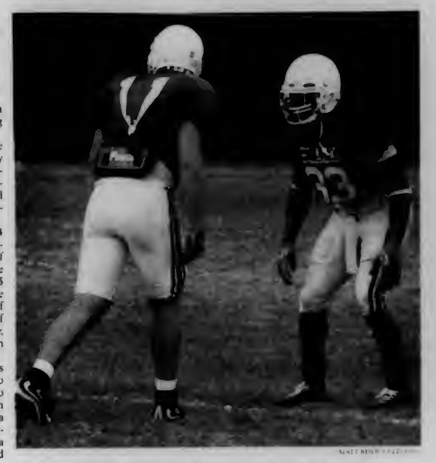
A new era in Amherst

Don Brown takes over as head football coach

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' 2004 football season began before this issue went to press. Last Saturday, September 4, the Minutemen traveled to face Delaware State in a non-conference matchup. For a recap and full coverage of that game and a preview of this weekend's home opener against Colgate, please see tomorrow's edition of the Collegian.

Football has often been overlooked in Western Massachusetts. Despite a Division I-AA National Championship, a pair of Atlantic 10 titles and three NCAA playoff appearances to his credit, departed head coach Mark Whipple never could build the kind of fan support necessary to move the proud program from the doldrums of college football's minor league to the green grass and bright lights of Division I-A.



For Whipple, this frustrating struggle culminated with a special athletic department commission's finding that such a move was not only unlikely, but also hardly feasible in the near future. Thus, it was time to move on, and the former Brown graduate took a prestigious position with the National Football League's Pittsburgh Steelers doing what he does best: coaching quarterbacks.

The Minutemen were forced to move forward, and they did, hiring the man they wanted all along. Former defensive coordinator Don Brown was brought in to stabilize a program in flux, and while his initial legal troubles accomplished just the opposite at first, he has since done just that.

The Maroon and White open 2004 ranked No. 19 in every major Division I-AA preseason poll, and will face a slew of the top teams in the nation including the two squads that played for the 2003 National Championship. Brown will be forced to watch the initial three games of his tenure from the press box as a result of his settlement with his former employer, Northeastern University, but the transition has been completed nonetheless.

A new era of UMass football has arrived – one that must be committed to excellence at its current level in order to even dream of what could be. The team will feature a new quarterback, a revamped defense, new uniforms, the second night game in school history and a legitimate chance to take home the storied

Brown a proven football mastermind

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Stepping into Don Brown's office in the section of the UMass football locker room known as "the bunker" is like walking into a molecular physics laboratory at MIT.

Chalk and dry-erase boards, notebooks, and loose-leaf papers blanket the room, and are covered with text, plays, formulas and verbiage that you would have no chance of understanding without a Ph.D in advanced Pigskinetrics.

Matt Reiko/Collegian

Coach Don Brown confers with captain Steve Costello at a recent practice.

If you can grasp the general gist of some of it, than you'll realize that it's not completely different from Newton's Third Law of Motion — for every play, there is an equal and opposite counter play. But make no mistake; it's not nearly that simple in any facet of the imagination.

What is simple to understand, however, is that the new head coach of the Massachusetts football team is clearly no slouch when it comes to X's and O's, as evident by his tremendous work in turning the Northeastern Huskies around from doormat to dominant.

And now, with the messy legal situation that evolved when the former UMass defensive coordinator left Brookline to head west taken care of, it's the Minutemen who will reap the benefits of being able to pick such a complex football brain on a daily basis.

"Coach Brown is a defensive genius, and a great football coach," sophomore strong safety James Ihedigbo said following his new coach's introductory press conference in February. "When we heard he got the job, we couldn't wait to get on the field with him and learn his system."

"It's been great, learning his plan and how he goes about doing things," quarterback Tim Day said. "We knew coming in that we were getting a great football coach, and working with him every day shows us how knowledgeable and prepared he is and how much he wants to win."

As has been well documented, the transition process was not an easy one for Brown, who was UMass' defensive coordinator under Mark Whipple in 1998 and '99. Following Brown's initial acceptance of the position, Northeastern filed for and was granted an injunction, preventing its former coach from accepting new position.

That meant that as late as spring practice, the UMass program was without a head coach and being led through workouts by a staff of assistants they hardly knew. This led to Brown and the University eventually settling out of court — at a steep price. The University is responsible for $150,000 owed to NU, and in a move unprecedented in NCAA history, Brown will be forced to observe his team's first three games from the press box, without any contact with his staff or players.

In the end, the settlement served as means to allow Brown to return to what he loves most, coaching football. Although there is clearly some frustration evident in respect to the sanction and bitterness in his heart directed at his former employer, which he now refers to exclusively as "that school in Boston," it's all business now that his return to the Pioneer Valley is complete; Business that started with asserting his credibility, and will continue on with the execution of his game plans.

"My transition was a bit rough, but with the players it has been easy," Brown said. "I couldn't be more happier family-wise, or with the state of our program at this point.

"I think the one thing that's been good is that I've coached a lot of the older guys; the Jeremy Cains and the Anton McKenzies, and I think they've helped me in the credibility piece. That helps me in sending a message to some of the younger guys that I'm OK."

"We've got to sell our system. We have to sell our philosophy and the way we go about doing things on both sides of the ball, and that's a day-to-day challenge that I'm excited about. It's one of the reasons that I came back here, to instill my system here and just see how it plays itself out."

Having now moved into the first full week of the season, it certainly appears that Brown's system is playing out just as many thought it would, starting with a defense decimated by graduation but revitalized by speed and youth. His players are, without a doubt, responding to his knowledge and his message, and are excited about playing for one of the brightest football minds in I-AA.

And such respect for himself and his staff from a team that hardly knew him at this time last year should make sitting out just a little bit easier to stomach, even if it's still too unappetizing to discuss.

"Respectfully, I'm going to stay away from [any legal issues]," Brown said. What is, is and I'll get through that. I've got a great staff and we'll be prepared.

"We're hoping to be 3-0 after the first three weeks and I have faith in my coaches and players that it will turn out that way."

Stars come out for Erving Classic

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

SOUTH HADLEY — With a clear, blue sky allowing the sun to shine brightly above western Massachusetts' newest elite golf course, countless celebrities and close to 100 participants made the first annual Julius Erving Celebrity Golf Classic a tremendous success.

Created by Erving to honor the memory of Jack Leaman, his former collegiate coach and the University of Massachusetts' athletic patriarch, the event signified a joint celebration of the three things the former coach and commentator loved most: basketball, golf and UMass.

Proceeds from the event, which took place Aug. 30, were raised to benefit the Jack Leaman Legacy Fund, which provides scholarships for UMass student-athletes.

"In the spirit of Coach Leaman, we have had a perfect day," Erving said. "Everybody had a great time and we all had fun under the guise of doing something for a great cause, the Leaman Legacy Fund. I am honored and privileged to have my name identified with this tournament.

"Basketball and golf were two things coach Leaman loved dearly, and this is something he would have loved and been proud of. It means a lot to me to be able to take two things he was passionate about and combine them into such a great event and to benefit a great cause."

Coach Leaman's widow Rita also spoke about the success and nature of an event her husband would have loved to have been involved with.

"It was a wonderful game and a great time, Jack would have loved it," she said, "The great support made this successful and I am very grateful."

"I want to thank everybody for being here and supporting the event. Certainly Julius was the driving force behind it along with Tim Kennes."

Celebrities in attendance included Erving and basketball greats Bill Russell, Moses Malone and Clyde Drexler. Also participating were a handful of UMass personalities, past and present, including men's basketball coach Steve Lappas, women's basketball coach Marrie Dacko, ice hockey coach Don "Toot" Cahoon, softball coach Elaine Sortino, former basketball players Derek Kellogg, Tony Barbee and Tyrone Weeks, and graduated hockey star Thomas Pock.

Barbee's foursome, which included Glen Allan, Sandy Allan and Doug Dugreniar, finished atop the leader board with a nine under par 63.

Barbee himself also connected for the longest drive on the men's side, while Shawn Durocher took home that distinction on the women's side.

Joe Mantegna won the closest-to-the-pin competition, coming within three inches on the seventh hole.

All in all, it was a banner day for Erving, UMass athletics, the many participants and the legacy of Jack Leaman; one that the former coach and mentor of many would have been fiercely proud of.

"I wanted to do something other than just write a check," Erving said. "In creating this tournament, we feel like we're best honoring and remembering what Jack Leaman was truly all about.

"His spirit is still with us, and I'm honored to be doing this in his name."

Trio of veterans to lead men's soccer

Coach Sam Koch hopes strong defense will spell success in '04

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

In college athletics each passing year brings a sense of uncertainty. Seniors graduate, new blood comes in, and those somewhere in the middle continue to try and improve upon their games so to have their names synonymous with success.

For the Massachusetts men's soccer team, there will be a taste of all three during the 2004 season, a season that will give a glimpse of what happens when the past meets the future.

Craig Canavan, seen here attempting a header during the 2003 season, was one of three captains named by head coach Sam Koch.

Captains

This year's captains exhibit experience in every facet of the game. Striker Oral Bullen, goalie Colin Burns, and defensive stalwart Craig Canavan will be the leaders of this year's team, each endowed with significant playing time over the last couple of years.

Bullen will be the leader of the offense this year for the Minutemen, and returns as the team's leading scorer from last season with eight goals and four assists. In the past Bullen has always been a secondary option, but this year he will not only have to be a scoring threat, but an efficient organizer for an offense that has its fair share of question marks.

While Bullen is not expected to be the type of do-it-yourself scorer, as UMass has had in the past with the likes of all-everything Jeff Deren and the always dangerous Ptah Myers, he will be looked upon for his field vision, and his ability to open up opportunities for other players.

"I think he's a team player, he's going to be playing with everybody else," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "If we have to depend on him to carry the whole team, then we're not going to be successful and he's not going to be successful."

Canavan is coming off an injury-plagued year, which kept him out of the lineup for the waning weeks of the season. Through the beginning of the 2003 campaign, Canavan established himself as one of the best defenders in the A-10, and a vocal leader on the field for the Minutemen.

Canavan is always one of the more experienced players on the field as he played a year of college soccer at the University of New Hampshire, before enlisting in the Navy where he competed for the next five years.

With his time around the game, Canavan has become comfortable in different positions and is able to play efficiently in the midfield or in the back line. He has been a welcome edition to Koch's team as he adds a different dimension to the way the Minutemen can approach their defense.

"He's focused and fit and he's playing very well. He's playing very well for us up at the defensive midfield," Koch said. "He can sweep for us, he can play defensive midfield, he'll play somewhere in the middle in the back."

For senior Colin Burns, this season represents his last chance to truly be the man for the Minutemen. Coming into the 2003 season, Burns was labeled as the surefire candidate for starting keeper, that is until a freshman by the name of Nick Billman came and made a name for himself.

The Burns/Billman competition will be going strong into this season, but that takes nothing away from the respect that Burns has earned over his tenure with the Maroon and White. Burns is a fifth-year senior and has seen the highs and lows of college soccer and his experience in net has earned accolades from coaches and peers alike.

"Colin has weathered so many storms I don't think anything could surprise him," Koch said.

Every year the team votes on their captains and Koch is very pleased with their selections this year. He believes that with their experience, the youth on his squad can benefit and be prepared to make a push at the top of the A-10 this year.

"They are respected by their teammates; they are good leaders, good communicators, and they understand what needs to be done," Koch said.

Defense

If there was ever a team that embodied the old cliché, "the best offense is a good defense," the 2004 Minutemen would be it. Anchored by sweeper Tim Kitchell, and roving center midfielder and co-captain Craig Canavan, this year's defense is as good as any in the Northeast.

Last year Canavan was the starting sweeper for the first half of the season until he suffered season-ending stress fracture in his foot. Kitchell solidified his game through experience last year, starting nine games, and has emerged as a vocal leader in the back.

"We're really composed, we have Canavan, we have myself, so we have some age in our defense," Burns said. "His [Canavan] communication is just a big thing out there and Tim holds down the defense very well."

Another element of this year's defense is a degree of toughness that has been lacking in the past.

In an exhibition game against Notre Dame on August 28th, sophomore defenseman Ian O'Donnell was going shoulder to shoulder with a Fighting Irish attack man, lobbying for possession. The ball was crossed, then quickly lobbed back to O'Donnell's man. In a last second attempt to thwart the play O'Donnell lunged at the ball and cleared it from danger with a header.

As he got up it was clear that he had split his forehead and was gushing blood as he casually walked over to the official. On the way off the field he walked past Koch and said to the trainer, "Just make it stop bleeding."

Less than five minutes later, O'Donnell was back in, taped up and ready to play.

"I just can't say enough about O'Donnell, he's amazing, we need tough guy like him back here and that's why I like this defense," Burns said after the game

Adding to the defensive pressure will be sophomore Todd Skelton, who didn't see a lot of playing time last year, but has gotten significant minutes since last spring, in exhibition games.

Last year's defense was one of the best in the A-10, and this year looks to be no different. The Minutemen gave up an average of 1.24 goals a game in 2003, and with the goaltending tandem of Burns and Nick Billman once again vying for time: UMass has little to worry about between the pipes.

"There's no day off as far as they go, they just keep pushing each other and they will continue to push each other and it's a win-win situation for the team and for them," assistant coach Jon Lowery said.

Burns, who has seen some of the best UMass defenses of the past decade, is very impressed with this year's team.

"I was back here when went to the NCAA tournament and that was a quality defense, my sophomore year," Burns said, "But this defense has to be one of the best, I would even compare it to that defense that we had when we went to the NCAAs."

Offense

For the second consecutive year, the Minutemen have lost their leading scorer, and with that there is a void in the frontline. Ptah Myers led UMass last year with nine goals and was a consistent frontrunner on offense which alleviated pressure for the likes of Bullen and Ernie Billlitier (two goals, seven assists), who will be the leaders of this years offensive unit.

With this, there will be the customary changing of the guard that comes with every season and some of last year's youth will be looked upon to step up and take the reigns of the offense, many of which are in their second year.

"All those guys, I feel are going to help us and we've got other guys that are certainly battling for time," Koch said, "Guys like [sophomore midfielder Michael] Donnelly and a guy like [senior midfielder Gabe] Barnard who is always a player that's dangerous coming off the bench."

Another individual that will be vying for a starting spot will by Hawaiian speedster Richard Higa. He scored two goals for the Minutemen last year and started 16 games last year.

Higa suffered a minor injury during preseason, but Koch is confident that he will be back to form by the time the season gets underway.

"I can tell he's affected a bit by the traveling," Koch said, "He's been coming along, I'm sure he just needs to knock off some rust."

The Minuteman offense has also been in search of cohesion on the attacking end. In its last two games against top tier opponents, UMass has been held scoreless with 0-0 ties against both Rutgers and Notre Dame.

It did, however, have a respectable performance against the University of Montreal, who they defeated 3-1, with two goals coming from Bullen and one from freshman Greg Cirillo. Koch will be looking towards the freshman and sophomores to jell this year in order to pick up the slack from lost offense. With the talent of this year's freshman, Koch is confident that his team will be able to be dangerous on both ends of the field.

"How old you are doesn't

Mix of experience and youth for UM

matter, it's how old you play. We have some freshmen that don't play like freshmen. I'm not concerned about the age of the team; I'm concerned about the fact that we're inexperienced as far as playing with each other," Koch said. "My feeling is, by the time we hit the conference games we'll be a pretty solid unit and age will not be a factor."

Freshmen

As the Minutemen drew near to the end of practice, right before the final sprints, Koch let the team have a little fun and shoot penalty kicks on Billman and Burns. There were a couple of decent shots, nothing too exciting, a key save here and there.

Then all of a sudden someone walked up to the stripe and boomed a shot into the top right corner of the goal, well out of Billman's reach, with a lot of velocity. It was off the foot of a freshman, Mike Mingione, and this kick was a microcosm of the talent this year's freshman class brings to the table.

The Maroon and White have 10 freshmen on the team this year, including redshirt freshman Tyler Pagano, who was on the squad last year. They are a scrappy bunch, and Koch is convinced that, not one, but several of them have the chance to make some serious noise this year.

"They are good athletes, they give us excellent depth, they raise the competition in training and practices have become much more competitive," Koch said.

Mingione is one of members of his class that has a legitimate shot at playing time this year and with his resume, it's not too hard to believe.

Mingione was named All-League, All-Conference, All-Area, All-State, and All-New England as a senior at Immaculate High School In New Fairfield, Conn. He played a bulk of his time as a midfielder, but possesses the athleticism to play anywhere on the field.

He and the Arizona high school player of the year Douglas Rappaport are two of an extremely talented freshman class that Koch sees as an improvement from last year's squad.

"We're different than last year, because we've got five new players that can really contribute that we didn't have at the end of last year," Koch said, "I would say that we are a better team overall personnel-wise."

In both preseason exhibitions several freshmen, including Mingione and Rappaport have subbed in for upperclassmen and not missed a beat.

The Minutemen also picked up another goalkeeper, Peter Kersker, who will be third on the depth chart behind the dueling Burns and Billman. Kersker was brought in to essentially be a training goalie for the time being, but with his current situation Lowery feels he will learn and benefit from watching his peers.

"As a freshman, he gives us good depth, we have three good goalkeepers. Peter needs experience, technically he's very good, I'm very impressed with his technical ability," Lowery said. "He needs to get on the field in games and with Colin and Nick ahead of him it's going to be difficult, but he trains hard and he can continue to get better."

Last year was described as one for rebuilding in the early-goings and this year would seem to look the same on paper.

With a huge amount of youth one of the main issues for the Minutemen is getting everyone on the same page. If you ask sophomores like Billman and Higa, youth shouldn't be an excuse.

"When you get to college, if you can play, you can play. I don't think age really matters that much," Billman said, "If you can play and you like to be out here on the field, you should play. If you can step up and do it, then step out and play."

Burns, Billman battle for job

Minutemen to use pair of keepers during 2004 season

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

For any soccer goalie there is a type of important solitude that takes place. They stand alone between the pipes, separate from the flow of the game, and wait to make instant judgments that can make or break a game. They must conform to new styles, adjust to pressure, and in the blink of an eye be ready to contour to the ever-changing fluidity of the game happening right in front of their eyes.

Nick Billman

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

For the Massachusetts men's soccer team, this position brings up a very interesting problem.

It has two very capable candidates.

Senior captain Colin Burns and sophomore sensation Nick Billman make up perhaps the finest goaltending tandem in the Atlantic 10. One would think that with a situation involving always coveted playing time that there would be controversy, jealousy, and maybe even open criticism. Not with these two, in fact this competition may be the best thing to happen to either of them.

After a year that saw both keepers split time, the Minutemen find themselves in the same predicament. It is an issue that head coach Sam Koch sees as more of a blessing than anything else.

"We'll give them both time at the beginning of the season and whoever wins it through performance will be the keeper that stays in there. With the way they've been playing, one will play two-thirds of the game, the other will play a third," Koch said, "It's a great problem to have."

For a team that allowed just over a goal per game last year, Billman and Burns were generally lights out. Burns got a bulk of the minutes with 1048:37 out of 1744:56, and started 11 out of the 13 contests he played in. During that span he had an impressive 1.46 GAA (Goals Against Average), and a .730 save percentage.

Billman came into his freshman year with guns blazing, and in his 10 appearances, including six starts, he recorded a remarkable 0.90 GAA, with a team high three shutouts.

Assistant coach Jon Lowery, a former All Big Ten goalie for Ohio State in 1998 and 1999 and former keeper for the MLS's Tampa Bay Mutiny, has been teaching Burns and Billman the tricks of the trade.

"I think they've worked really, really hard in the off season and both had a good experience last year," Lowery said, "Billman is a real good shot stopper, he's improved a little bit coming off his line, and he's dominating his box in the air a little bit more. Burns has improved just through experience. With the work both of them have put in, they've both come along."

Lowery has seen almost every situation a goalie can. He has been the main man, a secondary option, and like Burns and Billman a near equal to one of his close peers. Along with his on-the-field guidance, Lowery has been an important mentor as far as the mental aspect of the game in concerned.

"John's unbelievable," Billman said, "He knows what we're going through, he knows the highs and lows of playing goalie and he knows about battling for time and everything else."

Perhaps one of the most interesting things about this goal-stopping duo is how different they efficiently play the game.

In goalkeeping height plays a huge role in the way one approaches the game. Taller players tend to be able to move around in their box and try to deflect crosses that may be within their reach. Shorter players like to stay at home more and position themselves as they watch the flow of the game unfold.

Colin Burns

Burns, who stands at 6-foot-2, tends to use his height to his advantage, while Billman (5-foot-10), is known more for his direct shot-blocking ability, rather than breaking up crosses that he might not be able to get to.

"I'm relaxed; I like to come off my line a lot because I like to use my height to my advantage," Burns said, "I like to control things a little bit more, control my defenders, control the flow of the game."

Aside from the technical aspects of goalkeeping, one of the major keys to success is game time experience. Both Billman and Burns have quite the repertoire of experience outside the college realm and have enjoyed success in development leagues as primetime keepers.

"Colin has experience playing in the PDL (Premier Development League), which is for college players," Lowery said. "Nick has been part of a great club out of St. Louis and he was in the Final Four with them this year for the U-19 National Championships. So they both have quality experience."

This experience has added a good deal of confidence to their games. Neither one is shy to shout out a switch or alteration of the offense to their defense. With this the team and the coaches have given them both the respect of a number-one, regardless of who's playing.

Not only has the team shown them respect, but through their competitive relationship, they have grown to respect to each other.

"It's been a great relationship with us, and our goalie coach Jon has really kept us as a group," Burns said, "He pushes me to play better and I push him too."

Said Billman, "We work well together, whoever is in goal, we just want the team to win. We just need a smart goalie in there in order to win."

Regardless of what happens this season, the Minutemen will be one of the most stable teams in the Atlantic 10 between the pipes. It will be a week-to-week affair, whoever is streaking will get time, whoever is down will have to fight for their job.

"They both have helped each other, they both have pushed each other," Koch said, "I think in a funny way they both should give the other one credit for making them better."

Curreri signs with Diamondbacks

Former UM star inks pro deal

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Following a breakout summer playing for the Yarmouth-Dennis Red Sox of the prestigious Cape Cod Baseball League, UMass catcher Frank Curreri decided to forego his final two years of collegiate eligibility and sign a professional contract with the Arizona Diamondbacks early last month.

He reported to the Diamondbacks rookie league affiliate, the Missoula (Mont.) Ospreys of the Pioneer League, on Aug. 19 and started his first game in right field. It was his first major experience in the outfield since he spent his freshman season at UMass platooning between catcher and left field.

The Weymouth native and Boston College High School prospect was drafted in the 41st round of June's Major League Baseball Amateur Draft, but his play in leading the Red Sox to the 2004 CCBL championship boosted his stock immensely and lead to his signing.

"Frank went from being a 41st-rounder to getting the equivalent of fourth-round bonus money," UMass head coach Mike Stone told the Springfield Republican. "The deal also includes money for college, so it was too good for him to pass up."

Curreri was tabbed as the best New England prospect on the Cape after leading Y-D with a .293 average, hitting two homeruns and collecting 15 runs batted in while posting a league-best .432 on-base percentage.

He was also the starting catcher for the East Division in the league's all-star game, and was named his squad's Most Valuable Player by the 70 scouts in attendance after hitting a two-run home run in the first inning.

Most impressively, however, was Curreri's play in four CCBL playoff games, where he hit .357 with five RBI and a .500 OBP in leading the Sox to a pair of series sweeps over the Brewster Whitecaps and Falmouth Commodores to earn the league title.

"I always felt like I could play in a league like the Cape League," Curreri said. "People look at guys from lesser-known baseball schools and always think they have something to prove because they're not from LSU or Miami.

"But the bottom line is, you can either play or you can't, and I always thought I could play."

With one of every six current Major Leaguers having played in the Cape League while in college, it is easily the most successful and renowned college summer league in the country, largely due to it's use of wooden bats.

However because the NCAA still permits the use of aluminum bats, the league has been known to humble even the brightest of stars for at least an initial adjustment period before players become accustomed to swinging a bat in which the weight is distributed differently.

Yet Curreri was an exception to this, as he got off to a ferocious start and led the league in hitting for much of the first half of the season — something he credits to his play in southeastern Massachusetts' Cranberry League last summer.

"I played Cranberry ball last summer, and they use wooden bats," he said. "When I got here, all the guys were complaining about their batting averages and how hard it is to swing the wood, but I kind of just picked up where I left off last summer.

"It just kind of came naturally and it helped me really swing well while most of the guys were still struggling to get used to it," he said.

During his two seasons at UMass, Curreri displayed his prowess hitting with the aluminum for coach Mike Stone's squad. He finished his career with a .363 batting average, ten homeruns and 81 RBI while collecting 24 doubles, 39 walks and striking out just 32 times in 270 at bats.

"Frank is a key player for us, a real integral part of this program," Stone said during last season. "People don't realize how talented he really is, and he never got the credit he deserved for walking in and making the impact he did as a freshman.

"Whether he's behind the plate or in the outfield, Frank is going to have a solid career for himself and has really helped this team in his time here."

In his final season with the Minutemen, Curreri was a second-team All-Atlantic 10 and first-team All-New England selection after leading the team with a .380 average, 54 RBI, 23 extra-base hits, a .464 on-base percentage and a .614 slugging percentage.

His seven home runs also tied for the club lead, and his 54 RBI and 16 two-base hits mark the fifth-highest single-season totals in those categories in team history.

Remarkably, he also reached base in 41 of UMass' 45 games, including the final 26 in a row.

"Frank Curreri is going to be a good player someday," said a New York Mets scout assigned to Cape Cod. "He may not be a catcher wherever he goes, but he has a good swing and great opposite field power and is such a pure athlete, that someone will find a place for him.

"He's a gamer, and a guy that a lot of baseball coaches and managers will enjoy having on their teams."

GO GREEK!

Fraternities and Sororities of UMASS • Building better leaders since 1869

WHY JOIN?

LEADERSHIP

The fraternity and sorority community offers leadership opportunities to prepare students for future careers. Members may choose to become involved in the leadership of one of the governing councils or the Order of Omega Greek Honor Society. Conferences hosted on campus, regionally and nationally, provide members with further opportunities to explore the realm of leadership.

SCHOLARSHIP

Academic achievement is a value of the UMass Amherst fraternity and sorority community. Members are rewarded for their academic achievements through chapter events and by membership in the Order of Omega Greek Honor Society.

COMMUNITY SERVICE

The fraternity and sorority community is committed to participating in community service and philanthropic efforts. Many national organizations have a specific service or philanthropy, such as domestic violence prevention, Pediatric AIDS, Big Brothers and Big Sisters, Alzheimer's Association, and Habitat for Humanity. Members will also have the opportunity to support the local and campus community by being involved in volunteer activities.

NETWORK/SUPPORT

The fraternity/sorority experience provides opportunities to meet other students. Members are encouraged to participate in other campus life programs and to join other student organizations. Intramural sports and special campus events provide even more opportunities to meet students, faculty and staff from various agencies and departments. After students graduate, alumni associations are available across the country and the potential for career connections are endless.

UNIVERSITY INVOLVEMENT

Fraternity and sorority members may be found in all parts of campus life: Student Government Association, Intramural Sports, Resident Assistants, Honor Societies, The Daily Collegian, Student Businesses, house councils and our governments, as student staff in many offices and departments, varsity sports, the Marching Band, and throughout the 200+ student organizations found on campus.

FRIENDSHIP

The result of fraternity and sorority membership: a friendship that lasts a lifetime, a brotherhood or sisterhood that one shares through the good times and provides support during the difficult challenges that come with being a college student. The fraternity and sorority chapters provides opportunities for members to periodically assemble and renew those bonds of friendship.

Future looks bright for field hockey

By Paula Aden
Collegian Staff

The 2003 season was a rebuilding year for the Massachusetts field hockey team. For the first time in UMass history, the Minutewomen failed to reach the Atlantic 10 championship tournament, posting an overall record of 4-15 (2-4 in the A-10), with the lowest winning percentage since the program's inception in 1975.

Although last season's Maroon and White won two of their first four games, they fell into a midseason slump where they had an eight-game losing streak from which they struggled to recover for the rest of the season.

Last year's team was built around youth, and with sixteen returning letter winners, the future looks bright for the Maroon and White. In fact, in the annual A-10 preseason poll, the conference coaches picked UMass to finish fourth.

"We do have a good foothold on experience coming back," Massachusetts coach Patty Shea said.

The Minutewomen only lost two starters, so the majority of the team has a year's worth of experience playing together.

"The underclassmen come in with a lot of experience, and the upperclassmen have greatly improved," Shea said.

Among the nine returning starters is senior goalie Christine Tocco. Undoubtedly the Minutewomen's star player last season, Tocco faced 274 shots, saving 149. She also posted one shutout, and managed to tally double-digit saves on five separate occasions, including a career high 21 against Maryland.

With a save percentage of .696 and 3.55 GAA, Tocco was a rock for the Maroon and White all season long. She missed only one game, and UMass women's lacrosse goalie Joey Rubin was called on to replace her in the 1-0 loss to West Chester.

This year, Tocco will have the added support of freshman Becky Letourneau, who is joining the Minutewomen as a goalie.

Additionally, several players are returning from injuries that kept them out of play for much of last season, including sophomore backfielder Tracy Razzano. Returning this season to the backfield are junior Katelyn Woolfrey and sophomore Kwylan Jaggassar.

Woolfrey and Jaggassar both started in each of the nineteen games played last season, and will be strong forces in leading the Minutewomen's defense.

Jaggassar is the sister of graduate assistant coach Kerry Ann Jaggassar, and is one of two players on the team hailing from Trinidad & Tobago. Last season, Woolfrey managed eight shots, despite being a defensive player.

Joining the starters in the backfield are returning sophomores Jackie Zacarian and Whitney Hopwood, sister of backfielder Kristin who graduated in 2004. Freshman Kara Murphy will also be playing backfield for the Maroon and White this season.

"We're basically bringing back our whole defensive unit," Shea said.

The forward line will be led by returning starters Adrianne Monaco, Caitlin Beresin, and Gina Sanders. Last season, Monaco managed 24 shots and 4 points, while Beresin tallied 21 shots and 2 points. Sanders, a freshman last year, tied for the most shots (26), even while playing every game with a torn ACL. The three starting forwards scored a total of four goals last season.

Sophomores Sarah Mulvanity and Elizabeth Andrews will also be returning as forwards, along with newcomer Rachael Mervine.

The remaining starters are the international midfielders. Juniors Jaime Bawden and Patricia Borneo, along with sophomore Marije Tigchelaar, all hail from foreign countries, bringing with them a wealth of international experience.

Tigchelaar, from the Netherlands, had eighteen shots last season, led the team in assists (2), and tied for second among the team in points (4).

Borneo is the second player on the team from Trinidad & Tobago, and played for the country's national team in last summer's Pan-American games. Bawden's hometown is in British Columbia, Canada.

Bawden led the team last year in goals (3) and points (7), and was picked for the A-10 All-Conference Team. Additionally, she played this summer for the Canadian Junior National Team.

Three new faces in the midfield will round out the team — Paula Verma, Erin O'Brien, and Nicole Phelan. Verma, a sophomore, played with the Minutewomen during their spring season. O'Brien and Phelan are both freshmen.

"We're still flip-flopping to see where people will come in, and where they'll fit best with the team and with the unit," Shea said. "We have to put the unit that plays best together out there, and not necessarily the best players."

The Minutewomen have the advantage this season of 11 home games out of the 20 scheduled regular season games. Additionally, should they qualify for the A-10 tournament this year, they will also have the home field advantage during the conference championship, which is scheduled to take place at Garber Field on November 5-6.

The team began their season with an away game in Connecticut against Fairfield on Aug. 29. Last year, the Minutewomen beat Fairfield 2-1 in two overtimes. This year, fortunes were reversed as the Stags took the edge in overtime, beating the Maroon and White 1-0.

Coach Patty Shea joins prestgious Hall of Fame

By Paula Aden
Collegian Staff

It has been a decade since the last class was inducted to the U.S. Field Hockey Association's Hall of Fame in 1994.

Yet on June 12, seven former Team USA members joined the ranks of the thirty-four existing honorees in the Hall of Fame. Among the seven was Massachusetts coach Patty Shea, a former goalie for the national team.

"[The lack of a recently inducted class] illustrates how difficult it is to play in those competitions," Shea said.

Along with Leslie Lyness, Barbara Marois, Laurel Hershey Martin, Christy Morgan, Marcia Pankratz, and Pam Neiss-Stuper, Shea was inducted to the Hall, located in Collegeville, Pennsylvania.

"We played together through a couple different generations," Shea said of her teammates.

"This dictates the level of excellence we had internationally, we were ranked as high as third in the world. We did that with a lot of sacrifice, quitting jobs, going on the road ... we truly did it because we had a passion for it."

"It really has more to do with my support system and my family," Shea said. "As much as the athletes have to give up a lot, the family has to give up a lot for someone to be able to play at that level."

Of the induction ceremony, Shea said, "The one thing that was special for me was that my parents were able to be there."

Selection for the Hall of Fame is based on a point system, as well as several other requirements.

According to the USFHA, selection to the hall is "based on achievement as an athlete or coach of a USA team, including long-term supremacy, innovation and contributions to the sport."

Additionally, an athlete must have played for the USA national team for at least five years, and have been out of competition for at least five.

Shea certainly qualifies. A member of the 1988 and 1996 Olympic teams, Shea was called "Goalkeeper of the Tournament" in '96 by World Hockey Magazine.

Earning silver medals at the Pan-American games in 1987 and 1995, Shea also defended America's net for a bronze medal at the World Cup in 1994. Shea also appeared at the World Cup in 1986.

During her 11-year tenure on the national team, Shea battled off more than a dozen knee injuries while being named USA Field Hockey Athlete of the Year twice, in 1988 and 1996. She also earned bronze at the 1995 Champions Trophy.

A 1984 graduate of the University of Massachusetts, Shea was named to the All-American team in 1982 and 1983.

She has coached the UMass field hockey team to five Atlantic 10 championship titles, and still holds the school record for most career shutouts (54).

When Shea ended her career in 1996, she had a grand total of 87 international appearances for the American team.

"We really loved wearing the colors of our country," Shea said. "A lot of athletes want that opportunity, but not too many of them actually get it."

program's 20th championship.

Yet in the end what it really needs is support, both from the surrounding community and the 20,000-plus students on New England's largest college campus, in order to finally begin working towards moving the program to the big time; the type of major support that, if it ever arrives, will surely be a long time coming.

Quarterback

Junior Tim Day won the starting job outright in a competition with true freshman Liam Coen and senior Steve Howell during camp, and will begin the season under center after sitting out behind Jeff Krohn last season.

In five appearances, three of which were starts, as a true freshman in 2002, Day hit on 34 of 64 attempts for 339 yards and a pair of touchdowns, and showed flashes of the mobility and capacity to make plays that Brown feels will best suit new offensive coordinator Kevin Morris' ball-control system.

"He's a very capable player, and we think he can do some good things in our offense," Brown said. "His ability to move around gives us a few more options, and he makes us a lot more versatile at the position."

Coen, who will serve as Day's primary backup if the coaching staff chooses not to redshirt the La Salle (RI) Academy product, has a bright future ahead of him as well and has drawn high praise following his first college camp.

"He'll be No. 2 going into (next) Saturday. If we got to win the football game, he goes in the game," Brown said. "He's a good player. He's going to be a very good player. We're excited about him."

Howell, Stoughton native Randy Pollitio and South Florida transfer Evan Kraky will also compete for time as Day's backup.

Offensive Backfield

An area that certainly has Brown and his staff salivating is the running back position, where the Minutemen return all of their primary contributors from a season ago to form one of the nation's elite units.

Senior Rich Demers, who is in his second season with the Minutemen after transferring from the now-defunct UMass-Lowell program prior to last season, will serve as the team's starting tailback after gaining 664 yards on 125 carries and scoring 5 touchdowns in 2003. The versatile 250-pound back will also split time at the fullback position with senior Steve Wysocki, one of the A-10's premier blocking backs, and has proven to be a capable receiver out of the backfield.

Another returning force carrying the football will be bruising junior Steve Baylark, the team's leading rusher last season with 1,177 yards and 10 touchdowns. Baylark needed to pass summer school classes to remain eligible and did so, giving Brown the option featuring a backfield with a combined weight of nearly 500 pounds and over 1,800 combined yards gained last season.

"When you put Baylark and Demers in the backfield at the same time, you better buckle your chinstrap," Brown said. "They are a pair of big, physical guys who will run right over you, and have a chance to really help us wear teams down."

Complementing the two power backs will be a pair of quick, athletic tailbacks in freshman Bryan Smith and junior Raunny Rosario. Smith, who was dubbed by Whipple as "a combination of Marcel Shipp and R.J. Cobbs" has impressed Brown and the staff tremendously in camp, and "will be in the mix."

"Bryan Smith has the ability to become a real game-changer," Brown said. "He may make some mistakes, but he's got a world of ability and we're excited about him.

Rosario, meanwhile, had a brilliant freshman campaign in 2002, gaining 758 yards, before a knee injury in week one last season limited him to only 103 yards on 27 carries. Brown says that he will see duty on special teams, and will be worked into the game plan in various capacities.

Justin Montgomery and Lorenzo Perry will also push for time as tailback, while Kyle Harrington will push Demers and Wysocki at the fullback position.

Wide Receiver/Tight End

Another one of UMass' stronger groups, the receiving corps is anchored by All-American and All-Conference star Jason Peebler, who caught 50 balls for 1,003 yards and 13 touchdowns and had been named one of four captains.

A strong, aggressive pass-catcher, Peebler has added seven pounds of muscle in the off-season and Brown lauds his ability to make things happen and play the physical game with cornerbacks and safeties.

"He's our game breaker, no question about it. We're hoping to get the ball in his hands through the air and on kickoff returns as well," he said. "[Peebler] can take the hitch route or a short route and turn it into a homerun. The thing about him is that he's 218 pounds ... so if you don't put it on him, he's gone.

"We've had a good look at [Coach Morris'] system over the winter and in spring ball," Peebler said. "I think now that we're going here, we're starting to get a good grip on it."

Peelber is not the only UMass wideout with game breaking ability, however, joining him as targets for Day include speedy senior Dominique Stewart, who caught 37 passes for 464 yards and two touchdowns in 2003, and Boston College transfer Nathanael Hassleback, whom Brown believes, along with 6-foot-4 sophomore Brandon London and redshirt freshman J.J. Moore, will make an immediate impact.

Sophomores Jake Morgan and Domenique Milton will also provide added depth at the position and on special teams

The Maroon and White also returns its top two tight ends from a season ago. Junior Mike Douglas has switched numbers (from 83 to 44), but remains as the starter after hauling in 10 passes for 92 yards and a score.

Returning as his backup will be senior Sean Young, who has evolved into a very good blocker and will look to become more involved in the passing attack.

Offensive Line

The Minutemen will once again be well-stocked along the offensive line this season, as they will return four starters from last season and welcome back another from the 2002 squad.

Leading the charge up front on offense will be All-A-10 senior Rob Kane, who has been named the team's second offensive captain. A four year starter, the Londonderry, NH native can play either guard or tackle and is, as labeled by Brown, "a mauler." He will likely begin the season as the right tackle, but could be moved around as needed.

Joining him along the line will be junior left tackle Colin Stoetzel, sophomore right guard David Thompson and sophomore center Alex Miller, whom Brown praises for his ability to call out blocking assignments and communicate on the line.

Junior guard O.J. McBride will fill the fifth and final piece of the puzzle after missing all of last season due to injury. He will return to his left guard position to once again give UMass a physical and punishing line to spearhead its run-based offense.

"I'm just excited to be back, and playing with a group that has this much talent," McBride said. "We have the potential to be a dominant line, and you can't hate that."

The top reserve at the position will be redshirt freshman Matt Austin, as the group will be without Ryan Luke while the sophomore recovers from a broken finger.

"Offensively we're a little bit more mature. There are a few more seniors and some more experience among the core guys on that side of the ball.

"We have four guys with great experience on the offensive line, led by Rob Kane, and those guys have just picked it right up from the spring."

Defensive Line

For the coaching staff and most notably Brown, the rebuilding starts here. UMass will shift away from the 3-4 alignment used by former defensive coordinator Tom Masella, and will instead employ a 4-3 set.

Junior Keron Williams is the only returnee of note among this group, and will be counted on to make plays from his defensive end position after tallying 31 tackles, four tackles for loss, two sacks and a team-best 14 quarterback hurries last season.

Fellow junior Justin Schweighardt, a transfer from Division I Ball State, has impressed Brown with his progress in camp and has earned one of the two tackle positions, joining him in the middle will be sophomore Jason Leonard, who saw limited action last fall in making 12 tackles and one sack.

Manning the other end position will be sophomore Ola Sanusi, who Brown said had "improved tremendously" and should make a solid contribution.

"We're very young up front, there's no question about that," Brown said. "Keron Williams is going to be our playmaker, and we've been pleasantly surprised with how well Schweighardt has progressed.

"We're hoping to make up for our lack of size and experience with speed, and guys like Sanusi give us the chance to get a lot quicker and we like that."

at end will be redshirt freshmen Jason Hill and Andrew Blumenthal, while junior Phil Rossomando and freshman Wilner Alexis will push for time at tackle.

Linebacker

The Maroon and White also graduated a great deal of talent within the linebacking corps as well, but returns one of its premier all-around players — and first junior captain since Khari Samuel — in middle linebacker Serge Tikum.

Fifth on the team in tackles with 83 last season, 10 of which were for a loss, Tikum also collected four sacks and laid a bevy of devastating hits on unsuspecting opponents that earned him the distinction as one of the conference's top tacklers.

"We're very young on defense, where we only have three seniors." Brown said. "But I'm excited with how well we move around. Serge Tikum has led the linebacker corps and done a great job with that. He's our guy, and we trust him and know he's going to make plays."

Holding down the outside spots will be sophomore Charles Walker and Junior Brad Anderson. Walker played sparingly last season, making 13 tackles and recovering two fumbles, while Anderson transferred from I-A Vanderbilt two seasons ago and posted 19 tackles in 2003.

Both are quick and athletic, and will help round out the transition from size to speed on the defensive side that Brown feels will benefit the unit as a whole.

"We had a referee working our scrimmage the other day that I've known for a while," he said. "And he said to me, 'this is the quickest group you've ever had.' I think that's saying something.

"We've lost a lot of good players on our front seven, but we feel good about the guys we've replaced them with and what they can do. We have the speed and quickness to get right after teams and just disrupt the hell out of them."

The wildcard at linebacker and on the defensive line as well will be junior L.A. Love. Ravaged by injuries in his time at UMass, the ultra-talented Love will be used situationally as a pass rusher as outside linebacker and defensive end, and should thrive getting to the passer in Brown's system.

Reserves at linebacker who will also see time include junior Isaac Kaufman and redshirt freshmen Jason Hatchell and Geno Brown.

Defensive Backfield

Far and away the most talented unit on the squad and possibly in the conference, Brown will count on this group to perform as good as any in the nation.

Confident, aggressive, quick and athletic, there is certainly a swagger about this group and Brown is hoping that its play will reflect that.

Leading the charge will be arguably the best pair of safeties in I-AA in junior Shannon James and sophomore James Ihedigbo. James totaled 100 tackles, four interceptions and five pass breakups in 2003, while splitting his time between cornerback and free safety.

The man they call "Digs," meanwhile, collected 74 tackles and four interceptions and also blocked a punt that was returned for a touchdown in the first quarter of UMass' opening round I-AA playoff game.

"We're the best [pair of safeties] in the Atlantic 10, without a doubt in my mind," said Ihedigbo, the former Amherst Regional star. "Myself and Shannon, we're going to put it on you. We're both aggressive, can cover and love to hit, and we're going to be ready to play come Saturday."

James, who put on ten pounds of muscle over the summer, looks physically better than ever but has been hampered by a leg injury. Nonetheless when healthy, this pair of bone-crushing hitters will serve to strike fear into receivers' hearts around the A-10.

Also capable of stepping in at safety as part of nickel and dime packages will be senior Leroy Brooks and junior Greg Scott, who was converted to defense after beginning as a wide receiver.

Not to be overlooked amidst the talented secondary is a dominant pair of corners in pre season First Team All-Atlantic 10 selection Steve Costello and 2002 A-10 Rookie of the Year R.J. Cobbs.

Costello, who led the conference with six interceptions last season and rounds out the team's four captains, had off-season abdominal surgery but will likely be ready to start the season after earning the reputation as the league's best at the position.

Cobbs missed all of last season due to personal reasons, and will return to his natural cornerback position after leading the Minutemen in rushing two seasons ago and being named preseason first team all-conference on offense last season.

"We can go out there and just shut down the other team's receivers," Cobbs said of himself and Costello. "We're alike in that we love to play physical and get right up on the line, and we don't ever want to be beat.

"Myself, Steve, Digs, Shannon and Tracy Belton, we're easily the best secondary in the Atlantic 10, no doubt, if not one of the best in the nation."

Belton, a sophomore who made 23 tackles and picked off four passes last season, will also be relied on heavily to spell James and Costello and to enter the game on third down and in nickel situations. Springfield native Julius Walker has also played will in camp, and will be added to the mix in certain situations.

In all, the talent and man-to-man ability the group possesses will give Brown the ability to take pressure off his inexperienced front seven and blitz more freely, causing the chaos he hopes will result.

"The talent we have back there allows us to do so many things defensively," he said. "And more importantly, it takes the strain off the front guys and increases the learning curve just a bit."

Special Teams

With the kicking competition likely coming down to the wire and UMass' Sept. 4 season opener, a starter will not have been named before The Collegian goes to press.

Sophomore Michael Torres will handle the kick-off duties exclusively, but continues to battle it out with senior Matt Goldstein, a transfer from D-I New Mexico, for the regular placekicking duties.

Torres ranked second on the team in scoring last season with 67 points after hitting nine-of-15 field goals and 40-of-44 extra points.

Sophomore Christian Koegel will return at the team's punter after kicking 68 times and netting a 39.2-yard average with 19 punts downed inside the opponents 20-yard line.

Goldstein has proven to be a capable punter as well, and will backup Koegel.

The Minutemen will also boast a great deal of talented returners, as Costello, James, Stewart, Peelber, Cobbs, Hasselback and Perry have all proven to be very capable in that capacity.

A new Day dawns

Junior quarterback tabbed to lead team

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The image was an indelible one: a true freshman quarterback, having just made the most critical of mistakes in the most crucial of games, sobbing openly in the arms of his coach and teammate on the snow-covered turf of McGuirk Alumni Stadium. 5,000 UMass fans in the stands and countless others watching on television that late fall afternoon will never forget it.

That was November 16, 2002, and Tim Day has come a long way since he was sacked by Hofstra's Shaun Kinsley to end the game described by this publication at the time simply as a "heartbreaker."

MATT BRIDGMAN/COLLEGIAN

Starting quarterback Tim Day looks for an open receiver during preseason camp. Day started UMass' opening game at Delaware St.

He is no longer a wide-eyed, 19-year old frosh out of Manchester (N.H.) Central High School, but rather a bigger, faster and more cerebral quarterback who benefited from a year of study behind departed star Jeff Krohn. He's switched numbers (from 16 to 10) because "the old one didn't work for him," and his integrity amongst his teammates and inclination to take a leadership role has clearly increased.

In other words, Day has grown up, on and off the field. The coach who recruited him, Mark Whipple, has since left for the National Football League, but the younger brother of former New Hampshire star signal caller Ryan Day has not wavered from his course; a course that culminated with new Massachusetts head coach Don Brown and his staff naming Day the team's starting quarterback to begin the 2004 season.

"Timmy's our guy and we feel really good about him." Brown said. "We think he's the most ready. He's made a lot of progress and we think he gives us the best chance for success in our system.

"I have tremendous confidence in his abilities. I think he's going to do great things."

Thus, the Minutemen's Sept. 4 game at Delaware State will give Day the chance to exercise some painful demons. Stepping onto the field in Dover, Del., donning the maroon and white will be his first chance for redemption since that fateful day nearly two years ago — a day he still takes motivation from.

"I've had that game in my VCR a couple times to get motivated. But that's behind me," Day said. "I'm not even thinking about that stuff. It's a whole new season, a whole new staff and a whole new team.

"I use it for self-motivation if anything, but I'm just ready to go."

Brown also agrees that the opportunity he's provided the young quarterback is a fresh start, and that a new coaching staff and different offensive philosophy will help him look towards the future rather than dwell on the past.

"He shouldn't think about that [game] any more," Brown said. "This is a new team, a new staff and a new year and he's got plenty on this plate. We've thrown a lot at him in terms of what he needs to learn to run this team, to the point where he shouldn't have time to think about what's happened in the past. That's behind him and I know he's just focused on winning football games."

And winning games is something that certainly runs in the Day family. His aforementioned brother Ryan threw for 7,670 years as a starter at UNH from 1998-2001, and serves as a confidant for his sibling.

"We talk a lot," the younger Day said. "We talk about everything: football, college, life, you name it. He's there for me whenever I need him, and he's helped me through a lot because he's been there and knows what it takes. He's helped me a lot in getting where I am."

Nonetheless it was Day's own ability that led him to be named the first starting quarterback of the Don Brown era, and the coach remains most excited about his ability to make plays in an offense full of playmakers and on a team with championship aspirations.

"He has the ability to ad-lib which is always a nice feature, but we want him to run our offense," Brown said. "He's got a lot of good players around him. I told him 'you don't have to make every play. Make sure you distribute the ball and take what they give you and good things will happen."

A concept that, now two years later, Day understands clearly.

"The main thing is to run the football and play within the offense," he said. "Our offensive line and skill players are great. They're going to bring us to victory, not me."

Women's soccer re-energized in '04

Rudy pleased with improved attitude

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

It is late and practiced has long since ended, and Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy has assigned his players 60 extra yards of sprints to do before practice ends. As they begin sprinting, Rudy notices something remarkably different.

"They were running those sprints like they were the first ones of the day," Rudy says. "These girls have been serving everything I've thrown at them. They're a lot more serious about their training standards and personal habits."

And so marks a new era in Massachusetts women's soccer—an era characterized by a higher level of commitment never reached in years prior.

"The Cyndi Lauper generation is over," Rudy said. "These girls aren't about just wanting to have fun anymore. These girls, they want to win. They've been pretty vocal about change."

"I don't think there's a big leap in talent from last year to this year," junior Adair Blyler said. "But I think there's a big change in attitude and heart. I think everyone's came here with the same goal. Everybody wants to win. I feel as though everyone is confident."

After an injury-plagued, four-win campaign in 2003, the only place to go is up. But while an increased dedication and harder work ethic is a start, things will improve if the team stays healthy.

The Minutewomen suffered a uniquely high amount of injuries to its players, some being more bizarre than others. Most were minor injuries, ranging anywhere from an MCL sprain to mononucleosis to even food poisoning ten minutes into a match.

And if it wasn't happening to someone, it would get them the week after; at least one or more key players were on the sideline in just about every game. For the Maroon and White in 2003, it came down to a matter of what they had to work with, rather than what they had to do to defeat the opposition.

To make matters even worse, Rudy had to suspend seven of his players in the last leg of the season for what he deemed a violation of "training rules."

"We had at least eight or nine games last season in which we only lost by one goal," he said. "If we only had half the injuries we had, which would still be a ridiculous number, I think we could have won a lot of those."

Needless to say, Rudy is knocking on wood as the 2004 season commences.

"I'm knocking everywhere ... the floor, the desk, the chair, you name it. I'm taking this season with caution."

But apparently the Gods of soccer are not superstitious.

Before the season could even start, the Minutewomen were already succumbing to injuries. During warmups in their season-opener at home against Boston University, freshman Vanessa Lima got clipped, and was carted off in an ambulance. It was later determined that she suffered a severe muscle spasm, and she will return to action soon.

Later in the first half, the Maroon and White saw three more go down with Nadia Villaroel and Erica Wideberg sustaining leg injuries and Lindsay Bellini making a dangerous collision with her head. While Bellini and Villaroel returned in the second half, Wideberg was not so fortunate. After walking back to the sideline under her own strength, the senior from Randolph, N.J. was in crutches on the bench and did not return.

"In those situations, you've just got to tell everyone to stay positive," senior forward Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather said. "On days like this [August 29 against BU], when the weather is real hot and everybody is real testy, the best thing you can do is be positive every minute you're out there."

The memory of Stephanie Santos, who was killed in a car accident two years ago, still remains intact in the heart of the Minutewomen, as displayed in the first several games of the season. Along with the headstone of Santos behind the north goal — visitors have left rocks and flowers — each player sports an armband bearing the initials "SS", a number 17 on the right sleeve of their uniform, and the words "Santos 17" on the backs of their warmup shirts.

"It's a memory. We don't want to forget that she's not here," Rudy said, his voice getting softer the more he thinks about it. "It's more for us. One of these days, you might be in the position she was, and you're going to be able to save somebody. But you're not going to know that you've saved someone's life by saying 'Don't get into that car'. You will know if you didn't. That, I think, is the big message."

UMass brings to the table in 2004 what Rudy claims to be one of his strongest squads in years, returning his top three scorers from last season.

"Top to bottom, this is one of the strongest units I've had in years," Rudy said. "They are very deep, and all 22 players are capable of competing for a starting position. Each player has something in them that can make this team better than it was before."

On top of that, it is one of the youngest rosters Rudy has ever fielded, featuring an all-time high seven freshmen that he claims are all capable of playing. And should injuries persist along the starting eleven, the youngsters will certainly have the opportunity to show what they're made of.

Just ask Britt Canfield, the speedy young freshman from Granville, M.A. who came off the bench to score her first collegiate goal in the 2-1 loss to the Terriers.

"She's just so fast out there," Rudy said. "Her breakaway speed goes unmatched on this team. She will have an immediate impact."

With such a young team, Rudy will look for leadership from seniors Fairweather, Wideberg and Carly Turman, as well as juniors Bellini and Blyler.

At the forward positions, Fairweather and Blyler figure to spearhead the Minutewomen attacks. Despite having her season cut short by a knee injury, Fairweather was able to crank out four goals on a team-high 50 shots in only 12 games to garner second team All-Atlantic 10 honors.

Blyler, on the other hand, led the Maroon and White with six goals and three assists for 15 points in 15 starts.

They will be accompanied up front by the likes of Wideberg (12 games, one goal in '03), as well as freshmen Lima, Canfield and Caitlin Footit.

Bellini takes over as the mentor for a group of young midfielders this year. The former A-10 All-Rookie selection was UMass's second-leading scorer in '03 with two goals and five assists for nine points.

Providing depth in the middle are two promising freshmen in the form of Kaelyn Caldwell and Jenny Roehrig, who both saw time as starters against the Terriers.

"[Caldwell], she's very deceptive," Rudy said. "She's so small, but she plays very big and is just really tough to kill."

Also figuring into the mix will be Carly Turman (one assist in '03) and Morgan Czaja (one assist).

The Maroon and White thought for sure they were about to lose their top defender when Villaroel went down early. But like Villaroel (four assists in '03), this year's defense is tough and quick to get back on their feet.

"This is probably the deepest defense I've had in years," Rudy said.

A very consistent attacker, she will be joined in the back by the likes of A-10 All-Rookie sophomore Stephanie Barrett (one goal), junior Amy Maffucci (one assist) and junior Tiffany Hamill. Two young guns, freshmen Christina Nunes and Tina Rodriguez, may push themselves into a starting role.

After an impressive outing against BU, Rudy just may stick with sophomore Kristin Walker in goal. Facing 19 shots, she saved five and allowed just one goal.

Lindsay Fairweather looks to come on strong this season after missing much of 2003 with a knee injury.

A youth movement for Minutewomen

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

It is a common thought in the college sports world that in order for a team to compete at the highest level the roster must be full of veterans to provide leadership. When people try to gauge a team's potential they often look to how many upperclassmen will be filling important roles to determine if the team will be successful.

This 2004 edition of the Massachusetts women's soccer team is aiming to defy this axiom. In lieu of a large group of veterans to lean on, the team plans to combine talent and hard work to find a winning formula.

Coming off a 4-12-1 campaign in 2003, UMass will look to its three seniors — Lindsey Fairweather, Erica Wideberg, and Carly Turman — to provide leadership and experience. Also in the fold are six juniors and six sophomores who will be expected to step up and produce.

Although the Minutewomen will suit up these 15 returnees, the X-factor will be how quickly the seven freshmen adapt to playing at the college level.

Head coach Jim Rudy, in his 17th year at the helm, plans to throw the freshmen into the fire and expects this "Kiddie Corp" (as he calls them) to improve as the season progresses.

"You want the preseason to prepare you for the regular season," Rudy said. "Then the non-conference portion (of the schedule) prepares you for the conference. And hopefully by conference time we'll be experienced and things will be working out for us."

Rudy wasted no time getting the newcomers game action, as five of the six who were available for the season opener saw action. UMass dropped that game at home to Boston University 2-1, but it was clear this freshmen group is ready to contribute.

The Maroon and White featured two freshmen, midfielders Jenny Roehrig and Kaelyn Caldwell, in the starting lineup. Also seeing substantial minutes were defender Tina Rodriguez and forwards Britt Canfield and Caitlin Footit.

The lone freshmen in uniform not to see time was defender Christina Nunes; Rudy said he wanted to get her in but couldn't find the right situation. Amherst native Vanessa Lima's debut was over before it started as she was injured during pre-game warmups and taken from the field by ambulance. X-rays were negative and Rudy said she likely suffered a muscle spasm in her lower back.

The freshmen made their presence felt in the opener as Rodriguez connected with Canfield for UMass's lone goal late in the first half. Rodriguez lofted a pass over the B.U. defense and Canfield used her blazing speed to outrun everyone to the ball. She then tucked the ball into the right corner past the drawn-out goalie.

The performance was an early indication that the program may be turning the corner as UMass was beat 5-0 last year by a B.U. team returning much of the same core.

Rudy was pleased with the efforts from the freshmen, citing Rodriguez's strong play in the backfield and the energy Canfield added.

"It seems Canfield is a mental catalyst for our team," Rudy said. "She comes on and there is a little bit more of a charge."

Rudy acknowledged that there were some mistakes made, but said he is encouraged by the work ethic of the group.

"That's how you learn (from making mistakes)," Rudy said. "Then you go back and take a look and say 'now don't do this again.' They train hard. They want to know what they can do that's better."

The goal all season for the Minutewomen will be to find a balance between getting leadership from the veterans and being able to rely on such a large contingent of inexperienced players.

Senior forward Lindsey Fairweather will not only be called upon to lead the offensive attack but also to bring along her younger counterparts.

"It's kind of cool being a senior and helping out the freshmen," Fairweather said. "They're all really good and they're all contributing to the team."

Some may look at this roster and assume that the team is in a rebuilding process, but the talent level the freshmen class brings may result in the program turning around sooner rather than later.

Russell Simmons visits UMass

Legend of hip hop gives opening day lecture

Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Russell Simmons, the founder of Def Jam Records and an advocate for youth voting made the trip to the Mullins Center last night to speak about the importance of previously underrepresented groups, such as college students to vote in this year's presidential election.

Simmons is promoting the Hip Hop Summit, a non-partisan organization that encourages young adults to register themselves to vote. He said that one of the most powerful tools in voter education is dialog. He praised the hip-hop community and various rap artists for presenting dialog that the youth population can understand and relate to.

Simmons referred to the band Jadakiss' new single, "Why," which is a song that prompts the question "why?" to controversial topics such as terrorism, war and education. He said that it is important for today's youth to ask why and to acknowledge the issues that are affecting them.

"The foundation for ethnic understanding is always through dialog," he said, "and promoting through dialog is the most obvious."

Simmons has been using his dialog and encouraging youth voter registration all over the country. During the week of the Democratic National Convention, Simmons hosted an event in West Roxbury, Massachusetts. The cost of admission was to registering to vote, and artists like Wyclef and Lloyd Banks were among the guest performers.

"We were able to find grassroots organizations," he said, "and they are still registering people to vote, and all of the radio stations are still registering people to vote and encouraging voting."

There have been 25 Hip Hop Summits all over the country with celebrity hosts like Will Smith, Eminem, Nelly and Snoop Dog; all promoting the importance of voting.

"We want them to recognize that they are part of something big," Simmons said.

While speaking to UMass students last night in the Mullins Center, Simmons encouraged the student body to vote. No matter who you vote for, Simmons said, at least do it for a matter of "personal karma."

He acknowledged that he is not using his notoriety in support of one particular group of people, but all compassionate people. He wants everyone to vote and not just for one particular candidate either because he is not working for any certain party.

"In the primaries my favorite candidate was Dennis Kucinich," he said, "and I liked what Al Sharpton had to say. It is the people who inspire me to vote."

He said that he wants a president who can make America be safer and stronger and likes what Ralph Nader stands for.

"I want America to use its power for the good," he said, "I want my tax dollars to go toward a good cause. Last year I got a tremendous tax break and I'm not happy with a lot of things that happened within the last four years."

Simmons also talked about the impact of 9/11 and this year's election. "I believe that this election is more important, but really they are all important," Simmons said.

Simmons also noted that his response toward the 9/11 tragedies created a bit of controversy.

"I have an apartment right across the street from the World Trade Center," he said, "and I put two big peace signs in the windows. The truth is 9/11 happened and it was an opportunity for Americans to be leaders. We used a lot of fear and anger to support our foreign policy and basically fed it up."

Good friend and former head of the NAACP, Benjamin Chavis has also been campaigning with Simmons. Chavis argued that both John Kerry and George Bush have had the opportunity to relate to the youth but have not done a good job at doing so.

"Bush and Kerry have had the opportunity to answer the questions," Chavis said, "Both need to do more. A lot of young people will vote on who is more responsive to their questions." Simmons added that John Kerry has not really utilized his opportunity to connect with the youth.

"MTV seems to be a vehicle for liberal ideas, and Bush seems to be using MTV to his advantage and Kerry is not."

Simmons made reference to the picture of John Kerry windsurfing and said that instead of windsurfing, he should be out shaking hands of people in the "ghetto neighborhoods."

Matthew MacDonald/Collegian

Russell Simmons, founder of Def Jam Records, speaks to a crowd of students at UMass last nigh in the Mullins Center.

Simmons said that the current state of the hip-hop community is getting better all the time and that more and more young people are expressing themselves.

"Young people are writing poetry everyday and that is a good step towards their own personal revolutions," he said.

Currently, Simmons owns Def Jam Records facilities all over the world including Africa, China, Germany and France.

SPIRE system crashes classes

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Rumors of cancelled classes and general confusion reigned on campus yesterday, after SPIRE, the self-portal system that provides online access to SIS, (Student Information System) crashed Tuesday and most of yesterday.

New students, unable to access their class schedules online, wandered aimlessly around the Campus Center, unsure of where their classes were located.

"I'm a freshman. I don't know where I'm going or what I'm supposed to be doing," commented one student to a peer. "I can't go to class and I don't know what my schedule is."

"We know this is causing a lot of frustration and confusion," said Pat Kochin, director of Help Services in the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) in an email sent to UMass faculty and student UMail accounts. "And we apologize for the difficulties you experienced."

"I feel bad for the freshman and sophomores who are freaking out, wondering where classes are," said Jackie Burgoyne, a 20-year-old junior Spanish major.

Service on SPIRE was available intermittently throughout the day, with some students able to access the system from time to time. However, the majority could not, bringing streams of confused students to the OIT offices in Lederle Graduate Research Center seeking help.

Coordinating Council holds first meeting of the school year

Matthew Reid/Collegian

The Coordinating Council appointed the Chancellor of Elections last night.

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Despite a last minute call to order, the Coordinating Council met last night and appointed a new Attorney General, Craig Glodschmidt, as well as new Chancellor of Elections, Viktoriya Bonshteyn to the council.

Due to the fact that the meeting was called just 24 hours in advance, many members, including Bonshteyn, were not able to attend. Typically, when an emergency meeting is called, a 48-hour advance notice is given. However, since there was only a short notice, many key people were not able to attend because of work and other prior commitments. Bonshteyn, however, was represented at the meeting and she had prepared a speech.

Most other motions passed without any major dispute during the hour-long meeting. Motions passed included one to allocate $500 from summer reserves for the Door Hanger Project. Also the Orchard Hill Area Government OHAG and the Southwest Area Government (SWAG) were awarded $750 and $800 respectively.

In addition, the motion to allocate $5,000 to the Associate Students of Massachusetts (AMA) from summer reserves passed as well. The money awarded to AMA will go towards starting a new program that will connect other colleges around the state. Because the meeting was called in such short notice, many of the members could not attend which left two motions tabled.

The motion to break the tie for the Commuter Area Governor was tabled because both Dan McCool and Bill Surran were not present. Also, the motion to break the tie for the Commuter Area Secretary between Jessie Gold, Ben Goldberg, Chris Lammi and Carla Moy was tabled due to the lack of representation.

The Senate will be electing senate members during the last week of September. The first student government meeting will be called to order 7 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge on Oct. 6.

First Week 2004 hits campus

UMass spends $125,000 on festivites

By Sean Benson
Collegian Staff

An inflatable Twister board, a private show by comedian Lewis Black, an all-campus beach party, complete with mocktails, music, and University of Massachusetts signature beach towels. These are all sights and sounds of First Week, a series of events created to greet the incoming Class of 2008 over the Labor Day weekend.

If students thought the first few days of life on campus were a once-in-a-lifetime experience, think again. According to Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life, the approximately $125,000 battery of this year's First Week activities will hopefully become a long-standing UMass tradition.

"I hope [First Week] continues the transition from high school to UMass," Gargano said. "And I hope they [freshmen] understand that it's a sampling of what they can expect to see over the next four years."

First Week has traditionally been geared toward creating social events for freshmen, but its events are open to all UMass students. While the University has held other student activity days in previous years, this year's activities during the first week of school are more intensive than in years past.

"It's different in two aspects," said Gargano. "It's much more inclusive of student organizations. Greek life and University departments. I think the lineup of activities is at a very high level from the beginning to the end of the week."

Matthew Reid/Collegian

The UMass Minuteman Marching Band perform for parents and family on the practice fields by the Mullins Center on Friday afternoon. They later performed at Minutemania.

On Monday, sunny skies helped the campus carnival and involvement fair greet a steady turnout of freshmen and older students alike on the library side of the campus pond.

The involvement fair hosted a line of display tables from a number of campus organizations including the Student Government Association, the Student Employment Office, Commonwealth College, the UMass Outing Club and UVC-TV 19. In addition, fraternity and sorority members hosted carnival games and a DJ provided music.

The Locator Serivce, sponsered by Residential Life, directed students to classes yesterday.

Everyone seemed to be enjoying themselves.

"It wasn't as bad as I expected it to be. You get to meet a lot of new people," said Grace, a freshman living in Brown dormitory.

"They put a lot of money into it and it shows. I think students are excited," said Amar, a senior from Kennedy dorm.

Later on Monday, Minutemania served as the official welcome to the class of 2008 inside the Mullins Center. Approximately 2,000 students, mostly freshmen, watched Masters of Ceremonies Eduardo Bustamante, president of the Student Government Association, and Jackie Govoni, president of S.T.A.R.S. (Student Alumni Association Relations Society), introduce several speakers, including Jamie Newton, a senior student speaker, Christine Lopes, a UMass Alumni Association board member, men's hockey coach Toot Cahoon, and Chancellor John Lombardi.

In addition, the UMass marching band performed multiple numbers, which received standing ovations from the crowd. Also, the

Abiomed attempts to market artificial heart

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON — The maker of the first self-contained replacement heart is seeking approval to begin marketing the product for use on thousands of heart disease patients who are at a high risk of death.

If approved, Abiomed Inc.'s application to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration would usher in the first commercial use of the device, which has been under development for 22 years, Michael Minogue, the company's chief executive and president, said Wednesday.

The softball-sized, implantable pump is powered by batteries and has no wires or tubes sticking through the skin, unlike earlier mechanical hearts that were attached to machinery outside the body.

The AbioCor has been limited in human use to an ongoing, nearly completed clinical trial begun more than three years ago. Fourteen patients have been enrolled so far, with expectations that a 15th and final candidate will be identified soon. The 15th and 14th patients were implanted with the devices in May at Jewish Hospital in Louisville, Ky., and are continuing to recover. All the earlier patients have since died, with two dying during surgery and the others passing away anywhere from 34 days after surgery to as long as 17 months afterward.

Abiomed said it was not required to enroll the final patient or complete the trial before submitting for approval under the FDA's so-called "humanitarian device" exemption covering novel treatments. If such an exemption is granted, the AbioCor could be used in as many as 4,000 U.S. patients each year who are too sick for human heart transplants or any other treatments because of congestive heart failure.

Products approved under the exemption do not have to meet the same effectiveness requirements that other products must demonstrate for broader marketing approval.

The application was filed with the FDA on Wednesday. The company hopes to win approval by next March.

Abiomed plans to begin offering training to about 20 medical centers nationwide on how to implant and use the device. The plastic-and-titanium AbioCor will likely be priced between $200,000 and $250,000, Minogue said.

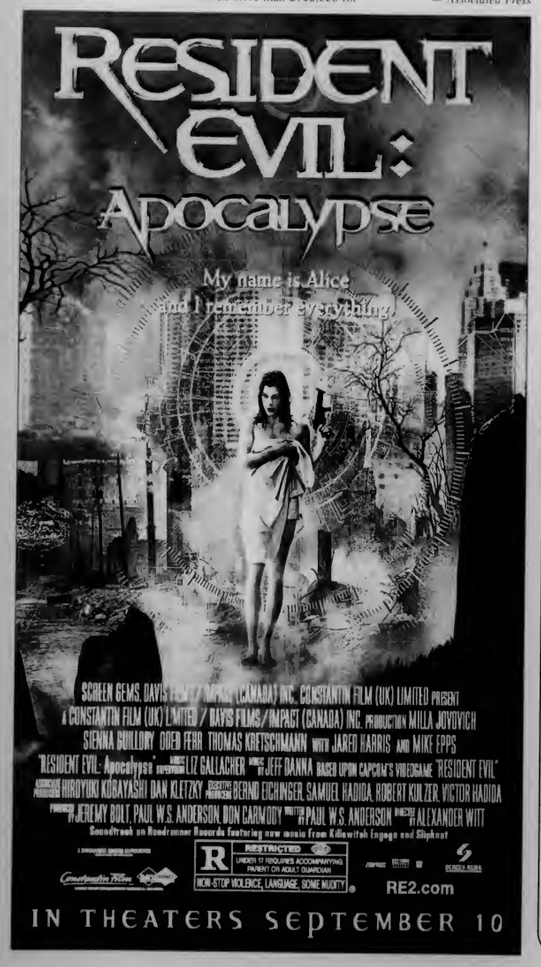
"The demand is going to exceed the supply as we ramp up," he said.

Lowell Democrat raises most funds for state senate campaign

BOSTON — U.S. Rep. Martin T. Meehan, who has said he would run for the U.S. Senate if John F. Kerry is elected president, far outpaced fundraising of other members of the Massachusetts congressional delegation this summer, records show.

The Lowell Democrat raised $590,973 between July 1 and Aug. 25, twice the $253,000 taken in by Rep. Edward J. Markey, D-Malden, according to federal fund-raising filings. Meehan's campaign funds total more than $4 million, almost double the $2.1 million in the account of Markey, the delegation dean.

Meehan said he hopes that "we're lucky enough to have that Senate race."



"We need to work hard now because President Bush has picked up some momentum coming out of the convention. In the end, I think John Kerry is going to win, but this is going to be a close fight," he said.

Following Markey in the money race is William Delahunt, who raised $209,322 from July through August, for a total of $1.7 million. Congressman Barney Frank, D-Newton, who's also said he wants Kerry's seat, raised more than $162,000 for a total of $330,000 cash on hand.

"It's hard to escape noticing that Meehan has more cash on hand than the next two members of the delegation combined," said political analyst Ralph Whitehead. "So presumably Meehan is trying to amass so much money that he forces one or more of his potential rivals to react." Whitehead said that Frank should not be underestimated.

"Though Congressman Frank is number six on a list of six, we all know that he has enormous national fund-raising potential," Whitehead said.

Catholic parishioners fight church closings in court battle

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — More than 150 parishioners from St. Albert's church in Weymouth went by busloads to court Wednesday, hoping to convince a judge to reverse the Boston Archdiocese's decision to close the parish.

The parishioners, who filled three buses, arrived at Suffolk Superior Court for the first phase of a lawsuit that claims that they, not the archdiocese, own the church buildings, the land on which they sit and all of the church's assets.

The parishioners have held an around-the-clock prayer vigil and sit-in at the church since the final Mass was celebrated on Aug. 29.

Archdiocese officials say the parish officially ceased to exist as of Sept. 1, its official closing date, but parishioners are not giving up.

In their lawsuit, they argue that Archbishop Sean O'Malley is "merely a trustee" of any real or personal property of St. Albert's and that only they have control over its assets.

"We're not going down without a fight," declared Barbara King, a parishioner who joined the church just 2 1/2 years ago.

The parishioners are seeking a temporary injunction to prevent the archdiocese from liquidating or selling the church or its assets. They also want the court to interpret an 1897 state law, which they believe established the archbishop of Boston as a "corporation sole," a legal entity that would act as a trustee but not the owner of church property.

Attorney Mary Ames said parishioners want an immediate injunction because they are concerned that church property, including 30 stained — glass windows, will be seized and sold or given away by the archdiocese.

"These are precious keepsakes more valuable than money to these parishioners and irreplaceable in nature," Ames said.

Judge Thomas Connolly said he would issue his ruling on the temporary injunction as soon as possible, but he gave no indication of when.

St. Albert's is one of 82 parishes the archdiocese is closing as part of a massive downsizing brought on by a sharp decline in Mass attendance, a shortage of priests and the high costs of maintaining old church buildings. The clergy sex abuse crisis, which exploded in Boston in 2002, exacerbated the archdiocese's problems.

After the court hearing, some parishioners said they believe the archdiocese will use the money from church closures to pay for settlements in sexual abuse claims, a charge the archdiocese has vehemently denied.

O'Malley's spokesman, the Rev. Christopher Coyne, was confronted by several parishioners after the court hearing. One parishioner, Sandy Jones, interrupted Coyne repeatedly as he tried to talk to reporters after the hearing.

"Have you ever been to Weymouth? Have you been to our parish?" Jones shouted. Coyne ended the interviews when Jones refused to stop interrupting him.

"I'm very angry," Jones said afterward. "They're liars. They lied to us about the abuse and they covered it up."

Coyne was challenged by several parishioners to explain why St. Albert's was chosen to close, when it is completely self-sustaining, has no debt and has renovated buildings that are not in need of repairs.

Coyne said St. Albert's was picked because it is the smallest of five Catholic churches in Weymouth and does not have a school. He said there are other financially healthy churches slated for closure, including some in affluent communities such as Lexington, Concord, Wayland, Sudbury and Newton.

"We can't continue to sustain the number of churches we have in the past," he said.

The archdiocese attorney, Wilson Rogers Jr., argued that the court has no jurisdiction to get involved in the internal matters of the church.

Congress rejects reinstation of 10-year assault weapons ban

By Aparna H. Kumar
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress will not vote on an assault weapons ban due to expire next week, Republican leaders said Wednesday, rejecting a last-ditch effort by supporters to renew it.

"I think the will of the American people is consistent with letting it expire, so it will expire," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R- Tenn., told reporters.

The 10-year ban, signed by President Clinton in 1994, outlawed 19 types of military-style assault weapons. A clause directed that the ban expire unless Congress specifically reauthorized it.

Some Democrats and several police leaders said President Bush should try to persuade Congress to renew the ban. Bush has said he would sign such a bill if Congress passed it.

"If the president asked me, it'd still be no ... because we don't have the votes to pass an assault weapons ban and it will expire Monday and that's that," House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, D-Texas, told reporters later.

Space capsule crashes in Utah

By Paul Foy
Associated Press

DUGWAY PROVING GROUND, Utah — The Genesis space capsule, which had orbited the sun for three years gathering potential clues to the origin of the solar system, crashed to Earth and cracked open Wednesday, exposing its collection of solar atoms to contamination.

Flight engineers suspect a set of tiny explosives failed to trigger the capsule's parachutes, and the capsule slammed into the Utah desert at 193 mph.

A recovery team that includes Genesis project members was dispatched to the crash site Wednesday afternoon on a salvage mission.

Scientists were hopeful they could salvage the broken disks that held billions of charged atoms collected from the solar wind, and perhaps still unravel clues about the origin and evolution of our solar system.

"This is actually not the worst-case scenario," said Andrew Dantzler, director of NASA's solar system division, noting the capsule embedded itself in soft desert soil and avoided hitting anything harder that would have made it a "total loss."

NASA planned to appoint a "mishap review board" that could take two to four months to determine a reason for the failure of the six-year, $260 million mission.

UMass dance team and UMass cheerleaders took a shot at energizing the students.

Newman told students to take advantage of all the opportunities offered to them.

"This truly is the beginning of the rest of your life, so enjoy it!" said Newman.

Coach Cahoon lauded students to support UMass athletic programs this year.

"I'm here to tell you to engross yourself in the sports programs this fall.!! We need your participation. We are what you are all about. We need your energy," said Cahoon.

After Minutemania, freshmen were ushered to a plentiful barbecue outside at the field behind the Mullins Center. Everyone seemed to appreciate the welcome for the most part, however, some were more interested in other events.

"I was just waiting for it [Minutemania] to end. I'm not really a pep rally person," said one freshman who wished to remain anonymous.

"I've enjoyed the activities. I'm gonna hit every event that I can," said Vanessa, a freshman who lives in Butterfield.

A group of freshmen from Southwest said they didn't attend Minutemania, but they were looking forward to Minuteman Mall Mania, an event taking place tonight where students will be bused to the Hampshire Mall in Hadley for a night of shopping exclusively for UMass students from 10:30 p.m. until 2 a.m.

The Greek life community hosted a beach party event on the library side of the campus pond on Tuesday afternoon. It featured carnival games, free food and refreshments, and Demstars, a steel drum band from Brooklyn, N.Y. Hundreds of students turned out for the show.

"Everybody seems to be enjoying themselves. It's definitely been a good turnout," said Farrah, a sorority member.

In an effort to promote a stronger Greek life at UMass, the Greek community contributed a large part of the First Week activities.

"Greek organizations are doing their best to promote Greek life on campus, so we're very involved in the first week activities," said Melissa Rogers, a sorority member. Gargano echoed the importance of the Greek presence in First Week events.

Gargano emphasized that he wants freshmen and other students to understand that First Week is the beginning of a trend. He added that UMass plans to provide students with events every Thursday, Friday and Saturday night for the rest of the year.

Russians threaten terrorist strike

Putin offers reward for capture of Chechnian rebels

IVAN SEKRETAREV/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Relatives cry while standing over the body of Zaur Gutnov, an eleven-year-old boy killed in a school seizure in Beslan, Saturday, Sept. 4, 2004.

By Steve Gutterman
Associated Press

MOSCOW — A wounded Russia threatened Wednesday to strike against terrorists "in any region of the world," offered a $10 million reward for information leading to the killing or capture of Chechnya's top rebel leaders, and criticized the United States for its willingness to hold talks with Chechen separatists.

The announcements marked a show of resolve aimed at Russia's stunned citizens, as well as Western countries President Vladimir Putin accuses of hindering its fight against terror, in the wake of three attacks that killed more than 400 people in the past two weeks.

In a nationally televised meeting, Prosecutor-General Vladimir Ustinov also briefed Putin on the investigation into the taking of more than 1,200 hostages in a school last week in the southern town of Beslan.

His was the first official acknowledgment that the number of hostages had been so high; the government initially said about 350 people were seized. A regional official later said the number had been 1,181.

Col.-Gen. Yuri Baluyevsky, chief of the general staff of Russia's armed forces, asserted Russia's right to strike terrorists beyond its borders.

"As for carrying out preventive strikes against terrorist bases ... we will take all measures to liquidate terrorist bases in any region of the world," he told reporters.

Baluyevsky made his comments alongside NATO's supreme allied commander in Europe, Gen. James Jones, after talks on Russia-NATO military cooperation, including anti-terror efforts.

European Union officials reacted cautiously to Baluyevsky's statements, with spokeswoman Emma Udwin saying she could not be sure whether they represented government policy. Udwin said the 25-nation EU is against "extra-judicial killings" in form of pre-emptive strikes.

Russian leaders have previously claimed the right to attack terrorists beyond the country's borders — tacitly threatening neighboring Georgia that Moscow would pursue Chechen rebels allegedly sheltering on its territory. Two Russian agents were convicted this year for the February car bombing in Qatar that killed a Chechen rebel leader, Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev. Russia denied involvement in the assassination.

The Bush administration also has a policy of pre-emptive military action against terrorists.

NATO officials declined comment. The alliance released a statement with Russia stressing both sides' "determination to strengthen and intensify common efforts to fight the scourge of terrorism."

OIT officials unsure when SPIRE system will be fixed matics major from South Boston, went to the OIT office for help around noon and wound up waiting for over an hour.

"I waited 25 minutes in the help desk line, and 45 minutes in the software support line," he said. "They seemed to have three answers to all of your questions: take this CD, read this pamphlet, take this sheet."

In the community-wide email, OIT urged students to find their class times and locations on Registrar's web site or visit the Undergraduate Registrar's Office in Whitmore for a printed paper schedule.

"It's annoying, but I think the professors will be understanding," said Burgoyne. "[SPIRE] is still so new, and there will be road bumps."

"The phone registration system ... worked perfectly," said Devlin. "Now we have SPIRE, which has not worked right once."

Sociology professor Millie Thayer told one of her classes yesterday that professors were being urged by University officials to be lenient to students who were late or didn't show up.

Patrick Callahan, spokesman for the UMass News Office, said that OIT officials could not say when service will be restored, but they are emphasizing to students that no classes have been cancelled.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

Thursday, September 9, 2004 Editorial@dailycollegian.com

SPIRE hinders more than helps

Tuesday morning, the SPIRE website became unavailable. The site was down for most of the afternoon and evening, and was down on Wednesday morning as well. With Wednesday being the first day of classes, and for some the first official day of college, access to SPIRE was critical for many students, but they were unable to access any part of the site.

SPIRE is used by students for a number of different reasons, including checking class schedules, obtaining financial aid information, and signing up for classes. Since the University has placed so much emphasis on making SPIRE the all-encompassing website that it is, it becomes a large inconvenience when the site is down. This was never clearer than Tuesday night.

Granted, we are college students and should not wait until the night before classes begin to look up our schedules. Even still, not having SPIRE available made it impossible to double check schedules, and find out which classes are in which rooms.

Up until recently, many classes still listed "TBA" under the professor and even the room number, so it became very difficult in some cases to actually have a finalized schedule.

Freshman coming to this university in 2004 will not have to deal with the dreaded telephone system that upperclassmen had to use in order to choose classes. Certainly everyone can agree that the online sign-up system is much improved over its predecessor. Once SPIRE became the universal system for choosing classes, students became comfortable with it and learned the layouts of the pages. Now the SPIRE layout has changed, and students are scrambling to learn an entire new system (if they happen to access it during a time when the site is not down).

Maybe the new SPIRE layout is an improvement, and most likely students will get used to it. However, if a university is going to spend all summer upgrading a website that they insist on making the be-all, end-all of organization, they need to make sure it doesn't crash the night before classes start.

For freshman coming to a college the size of UMass, the adjustment can be difficult. Giving them the added hardship of SPIRE crashing at such an inopportune time only makes things worse.

As part of first-week activities, freshmen were able to partake in a wide variety of orientation-style events. There were campus tours, guest speakers, and the Minute Mania celebration. But for freshmen, the true orientation happened at midnight on Tuesday, when they visited the SPIRE website and found that all-to-familiar error message.

Welcome to UMass.

Diversity welcomes all

Becky Martins

Though almost 25,000 students are enrolled in the University of Massachusetts, the school is less impersonal than many would think.

At UMass, everyone has the opportunity to find his or her own niche within the diverse campus. There are five living areas each with a separate identity that appeals to a variety of students. Southwest provides students with high-paced, urban, dorm life. Central, stereotypically known as a place for hippies, offers a natural, peaceful atmosphere in which students can reside. Northeast caters to different cultures, such as UMass' Asian population, as well as those people living alternative lifestyles. Orchard Hill, home to many Commonwealth College students, provides a living environment ideal for study. Lastly, Sylvan allows people the chance to live as independently as possible while still living in dorms. Although there are exceptions to these residential area stereotypes, students at least have an idea, prior to move-in day, which place best suits their personality. We then make our own decision where to live instead of being thrown somewhere we have no interest in being.

UMass also provides its student body with a variety of clubs and organizations in which to participate. Whether we choose to join an area government, pledge a sorority or fraternity or play on a sports team, the options to do so exist. We also have the chance to befriend others of similar religious backgrounds, lifestyles and races. Groups such as the Jewish Student Union, Pride Alliance, and ALANA offer UMass students support and friendship among people with similar interests and backgrounds. Having such a large array of student-run organizations makes the transition from high school to college, a move from a foreign country to the United States, or even major lifestyle changes, easier. Thus, a student should never feel isolated while on campus since numerous outlets exist to help you find others with whom you can identify.

Upon coming to UMass last year as a freshman 1, like many new students, was in awe of my new 'home.' Not only did the campus hold what could be a small town's population, but the type of people who occupied it varied greatly. Just doing something as simple as sitting in the dining hall enabled me to view all types of individuals. There were students who practiced faiths different from my own Catholic upbringing. Others who grew up in areas of the world very much foreign to me and also those whose lifestyles varied greatly from my own. Coming from a small town with little diversity, I was finally exposed to cultures other than typical suburbia—a change I greatly appreciated.

I have realized UMass truly cares about reaching out to its students and making them feel comfortable. No one is forgotten, though the student body may be large in number.

It was not long before I befriended people whose backgrounds did not resemble my own. I became aware of different customs, which before college, I knew little about. I attended various events in which I was able to share in others' cultures. Upon returning home this summer I found myself a new person: open-minded to all people regardless of our differences. College had proved to be a learning experience, both inside and outside the classroom. I realized how different life was outside the 'bubble' of my small town. Just being a part of UMass allowed me to finally see a realistic representation of the world; something my community had failed to successfully portray at home.

Over the past year, I realized though it once had been my 'safety school,' UMass is now the perfect place for me. I am able to get a quality education and prepare myself for what lies ahead after college. I have the opportunity to enjoy my time here and seek out others with interests similar to my own. But most importantly, I have realized UMass truly cares about reaching out to its students and making them feel comfortable. No one is forgotten, though the student body may be large in number. The school's intimidating and overwhelming presence at first glance is merely a deception. In reality, the deeper our involvement grows in the classroom, on campus and with other students, the more personal the school becomes. It simply takes a little effort on our part to discover what makes us happy here at UMass. What forms our college experience is a decision left up to us to make.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

The future according to Bush

Thomas Naughton

It has been clear to me from the very beginning of this presidential race that George W. Bush would not be unseated. Even if he lost the popular vote by a landslide, I would have counted on the Supreme Court, Jeb Bush, Sean Hannity of Fox News and most importantly George Bush himself to find or create a law stating that it is un-American and "unsafe" to allow for leadership change during the "War" on "Terror." Of course, we can't give all the credit to the Republicans for this extremely volatile political climate.

The Democrats in the last four years (or the last 50 years depending on your perception) have become happy invertebrates. In the wake of Clinton's fellatio fallout and conservative bullying after Sept. 11, they simply diffuse freely through political and social membrane, causing no stir and offering no alternatives to the blanket of blind and blissful ignorance in which the conservatives wish to wrap the nation at bedtime, all the while still managing to remind us nightly of the monsters (terrorists and "pessimists" according to the Terminator) hidden under our beds.

We cannot overlook a third group who shares responsibility for the conservative cowboy who has usurped the country, even though this group should have overlooked their 2000 presidential hopeful, Ralph Nader. Oh yes, I am speaking of the children of the Green Party who suck their thumbs openly today, scratch their heads and hold their own blankets to their cheek and wonder how we got ourselves into this mess. As if they didn't know that good old Ralph (who in his infinite "love-thy-neighbor" Green-ness has said some pretty questionable and anti-Semitic things) didn't have a chance in hell in 2000. You can still recognize the 2000 Green Party voters who wear their punch ballot slips as diapers; but don't worry, I think there are still shreds of the Bill of Rights hanging around if their nannies need wipes to clean up the mess.

Now that we are all acquainted and comfortable with the idea that Sept. 11 has delivered on a silver platter the country and the rights of its citizens to the Right Wing, lets take a look at our future beginning with the "re-election" of "God's chosen leader," George W. Bush. Since the election will probably be postponed, cancelled or simply deemed "un-American," Reverend Bush will have no problem remaining in the Oval

Office, where he will finally receive his most important instructions from the entity that he talks so much about: GOD. Of course, we think he is speaking of the Creator, when GOD is actually an acronym for three people who have the Vision of America at heart: George H. W. Bush, who will offer tutelage concerning Reagan-economics (a.k.a. The Rich Get Richer, The Poor Get Laughed At) and how to ignore AIDS victims; Bill O'Reilly, who will obviously write all of the president's speeches lying to the nation since he knows exactly how to sound Fair and Balanced; and Donald Rumsfeld who will teach our President re-elect (or re-appoint, or re-cheat, or re-turn-away-black-voters, whichever you prefer) important torture techniques to keep all dissenters at bay, lessons he learned from the Abu Ghraib School for Redneck Soldier Boys (and their girlfriends who have bowl-cuts). GOD is good, and GOD blesses America.

If there is no war going on at their time of enlistment, fear not, another war will start soon so that all of our children will have a chance to fire on defenseless people. It's valuable lessons like this that shape our nation.

In the next four years, the nation, which has already changed so much in such a short period of time, will continue in its fast metamorphosis from Land of the Free to just Land. Fox News, in a merger with the 700 Club, will be the only news source for Americans, which is a good thing because then viewers will be able to get weather reports at the bottom of the hour and preaching from the Old Testament at the top of the hour without question from dirty liberals who seek to make our country a Godless place.

George W. Bush, as advised by his Gepettos (Condi, Collie, and Donnie-oh my!) will install Ann Coulter, Rudy Giuliani, Rick Santorum and One Unknown Black Conservative (for quota reasons only, stupid liberals) to the bench of our Supreme Court where the real work can begin. Bills and laws from the New Supreme Court will emerge and be ratified with the greatest of ease without detraction from objectors, for in order to keep our blessed country safe, we must return to tradition, faith, and Family Values. There will not many objections in the first place as the Democrats will have lost their ability to even form a declarative sentence, and most of the left wing will be singing "Oh, Canada" and heading for the border because they know what's good for them. They know what happens to people who speak their minds: they get called "Girly Men."

Finally the nation will be as it should: Homosexuality will be outlawed in every respect. Abortion will be punishable by death. Marriage will be defined as between one man and one woman (as God intended) and everyone will be married. Of course, we won't be able to control people's intrinsic sexual desires so homosexual males will meet in alley ways used for abortions to engage in sex acts alongside evil IV drug users.

There will be no mention of AIDS or the contracting of such a disease. If a married man infects his wife with the disease because of his homosexual double-life, we will not acknowledge that they have such a virus, we will simply say "they are under the weather."

That label is much tidier than "AIDS Patient." Why must we always be so liberal, always so open? Where is the restraint and suffocation of our golden age when leaders like Ronald Reagan, Maggie Thatcher and other humane-totalitarians ruled the day?

In our new nation, no child will be left behind, unless you can't afford education even at the elementary level and then yes, your child will be left behind. But it will not be our fault because you should have thought about your finances before you decided to get pregnant. But if you can afford education, no child will be left behind.

We will enlist all of them in the army after they finish high school. If there is no war going on at their time of enlistment, fear not, another war will start soon so that all of our children will have a chance to fire on defenseless people. It's valuable lessons like this that shape our nation. There's nothing like saying the "Our Father" while you "liberate" a small child at point-blank range to make you believe in your country.

I know we are headed in the direction that God wanted: dead teenagers without reason, lesions on hands adorned with wedding rings, starving people who work long hours for no money, the words "under God" inserted after every single line of the Pledge and plenty of tax breaks for the closest friends of whatever conservative president who will no doubt take office for the next 20 years in our Sept. 11 world. All things I hope you'll vote for.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A CALL FOR SAFETY

With the beginning of fall, we are all getting back into the swing of things at UMass. All of us should be looking forward to a semester full of meeting new people, catching up with old friends, plenty of parties, and of course, studying and keeping pace with our classes. With all the thrills that accompany the start of the new semester, it is necessary to keep safety on campus in mind, particularly violence against women. In an exciting and often overwhelming environment such as UMass, it is imperative that each and every student is dedicated and committed to ending sexual assaults on campus.

I call on all students to become aware and stay educated about this all too serious matter. With this in mind, have a safe and excellent semester.

Let us fund our social programs

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

And so it has come to this. A cheap political trick laden with all of the standard conservative rhetoric in a condescending attempt to bribe the Commonwealth's support for the Republican Party and Governor Mitt Romney's irresponsible budgeting. August 14 marked Massachusetts' first-ever sales tax holiday and a misconceived effort to bail out a failing state retail industry during this supposedly slow time of year. Massachusetts is the 12th state in the nation to enact such a holiday as part of an economic stimulus package.

The poorly publicized event, which covered "all non-business sales at retail of single items of tangible personal property costing $2,500 or less" — motor vehicles, boats, meals, and utility payments not included — did indeed increase public spending by an estimated six times over a typical Saturday in August, though spending also dropped in the few days before and after the holiday. All told, The Boston Globe estimates that Massachusetts missed out on a much needed $6-$10 million in taxes. Although such a direction in tax policy may have a drastically detrimental effect upon the lives of all UMass students, few among us have paid the event more than a passing glance and have at best regarded it in absolute: that is, without properly judging the context in which such a bylaw was enacted. Yet as citizens of Mass-achusetts, and particularly as students at the state's largest public university, we have an especially vested interest in the direction of resource acquisition in the Commonwealth. And we are not happy.

Since the governor has been kind enough to bring such an important topic into the public eye, why not address the rationale for paying taxes to the state, shall we?

One of the three radio advertisements for the event concluded with Romney posing to listeners the supposedly rhetorical question: "Why should you have to pay taxes to the state?" What the poor fools on Romney's PR team failed to realize was the utter idiocy of this statement and the blow that it dealt to an otherwise fairly benign commercial. Yet, since the governor has been kind enough to bring such an important topic into the public eye, why not address the rationale for paying taxes to the state, shall we?

Well, for starters there's a little thing called fiscal policy! It seems that the Republicans at the state house have never heard of a certain John Maynard Keynes and the role that he played in salvaging capitalism from the brink of abandonment by inventing the policy conception of public expenditure for economic stimulation and welfare. This is quite unfortunate since they are charged with running the economic affairs of six-and-a-half million people. Unsurprisingly, however, and despite Romney's contrary opinions, basic Keynesian economics remain extremely relevant to this day and continue to be generally regarded as the best means for overcoming recession without running dangerously high budget deficits (provided, of course, that taxation policy drums up sufficient revenue). It is little wonder that continuous cuts in Massachusetts' social spending have done nothing to ease the state's budget crisis I suppose.

Apparently Mr. Romney continues to believe that the best way to bridge the state's crippling $3 billion budget deficit is by decreasing revenue. Apparently the nearly 50 business-friendly tax cuts in the past decade have not cost the state enough already. Apparently he plans to accompany the loss of public income with increased budget cuts to state universities (already averaging 20% annually over the past two years) and other public services, thereby making up some of the lost funds. After all, what does Romney care? His kids didn't attend public school.

Then again, we are talking about Mitt Romney here; let's give him the benefit of the doubt. Surely a professional politician and [in]famous organizer of the entirely uncontroversial Utah Winter Olympics of 2002 must be more than a little familiar with elementary economic theory and the realities of fiscal planning. So perhaps Romney's idea is to drastically increase consumer spending and the overall flow of dollars through the state economy. Such a tactic may be quite practical at times, though as we have recently observed from the latest round of misaligned Bush tax cuts, only when instituted as an economy is entering a boom cycle. During times of recession and financial uncertainty, the extra money afforded by tax breaks is generally horded and saved, thus lessening the total amount of money flowing through an economy and deepening the recession.

And how about funding our public education? The vast majority of both state and privately employed professionals in Massachusetts were educated at public institutions of higher learning right here at home. This means that devoting resources to our public schools is the wisest investment the state can make. Not only would increases in spending on education benefit the Commonwealth in the long run as graduates turn into the state leaders of tomorrow, but would also help stimulate the economy immediately by providing employment to teachers and staff while opening up further opportunities such as privately-funded research and increased alumni contributions.

Yet even as universities across the state surmount the annual struggle of colossal budget cuts, Romney proposes to cut taxes yet again and entice the very people who are most harmed by his proposition with glitzy one-time events like that of Aug. 14. Next time such a holiday is introduced onto the state senate floor, I say we vote no.

Think you have it bad?

Stacy Kasdin

Midway through August the envelope can be found creeping its way from the mailbox to your kitchen table. You can try to run. You can try to hide. But it will find you. No, it's not your tuition bill; it's your roommate assignment. In some ways it is just as scary. In other ways it is scarier. Before you move to college there's always that one guy who feels it's necessary to tell you about his friend's sister's ex-boyfriend who had this roommate who filmed and sold homemade pornography out of their dorm room. Maybe its true, maybe its not, but regardless it freaks you out.

If you're lucky, you move into your dorm, end up with a really cool roommate, or at least a tolerable one, and never think about the phantom pornographer again. If you're not so lucky ... well, there's always the hope a single will open up down the hall. In the mean time, keep this article nearby, because I guarantee you that I am the keeper of the mother of all bad roommate stories. Prepare to feel better about your situation.

It was my freshman year, her sophomore. She seemed like a nice girl. She invited me to dinner with her and her friends, helped me find my classes, and told me which take-out places were the best. The first major oddity I recall occurred around Halloween. My mom sent up a package with two pumpkin bins filled with candy for my roommate and I. She ate the candy and offered me the pumpkin bin back, explaining that she wasn't really a fan of pumpkins. I was a little taken aback by this, but, being the easygoing girl that I am, I figured this was just one of those weird things, probably due to a difference in upbringing.

Similar occurrences, I reasoned, were results of a difference in upbringing were her comments that she was looking forward to having children so she could beat them, and her consumption of a vitamin drink which she told me was composed mainly of dirt, bird spit, and chicken essence. Trying to take an interest in her culture I asked her which part of the chicken was the essence. She didn't know. She was kind enough to offer me some, but much like pumpkins weren't her thing, chicken essence isn't really mine.

Her boyfriend would come over fairly often, and she would sit on the bed on top of him and pluck out his moustache hairs with tweezers. Sometimes he would sleep over. They talked to each other in their sleep in Cantonese. She addressed him using the Cantonese word for husband. Strangely it seemed to freak me out more than it did him. I began to learn the lyrics to songs in Taiwanese, since that was all she ever listened to, at top volume. I hoped I wasn't saying anything obscene.

For the most part we were getting along fairly well despite these differences. Then things got interesting. It must have been nearing the mid-year point when I awoke from a deep sleep, blinded by every light in the room flickering on at 4:00 a.m. She was sitting on her bed, clothes on, wide-awake. She explained she'd come back to our room because she and her boyfriend had had a fight. She asked if I wanted to play Scrabble. Now I'm as big a Scrabble fan as the next guy, but at 4:00 a.m. I figure I'd be lucky if I could manage to spell a two-letter word.

I guarantee you that I am the keeper of the mother of all bad roomate stories. Prepare to feel better about your situation.

This too I brushed off, as simply a desperate cry for someone to talk to in a time of need. I continued to brush off similar occurrences throughout the year, and had myself so jaded I decided to spend another year as her roommate. If you thought the freshman year stories were good, you'll love this one, because nothing can top "the bird". Remember the story of the guy's friend's sister's ex-boyfriend's roommate? Well I figure everyone within six degrees of me will be telling this one for a long time.

I was walking to class one morning and laying out on the walkway was a bird that had crashed into one of the window and died. As one generally does with road kill, I thought, "Oh, how sad," and continued on my way. I got back to my room that afternoon and my roommate was sitting at her desk leaning over something with interest. Hearing the door she turned around and beckoned me over. "Isn't this cool?" Lying on her desk was none other than the bloody, dead bird. She examined it, rolling its head from side to side and stretching out its wings in awe. I had no idea what to do. I was in shock. Throughout my previous 18 years I'd learned all sorts of rules of etiquette, but what on earth do you do when someone brings a dead animal into your room?

I think I've started to block the event out of my mind, but I remember asking her what she was going to do with it (she wanted to stuff it and keep it as a "pet") and telling her that it was going to rot and start smelling. Long story short, the bird took up residence in her refrigerator for an indefinite period of time. One day a while later I asked about it, and she told me it had started to decompose so she'd gotten rid of it. Then someone from above smiled down upon me: she moved out a few weeks later. So next time your roommate borrows and stains your favorite shirt, or eats the last of your cookies, remember the bird. You'll be feeling better in no time.

World Perspectives

Gilad Skolnick

They all look the same, they invade your land, they reproduce like rabbits, and they're everywhere. Some would call you an extremist, but all you want to do is eradicate them. They're a serious problem here in Jerusalem, and many of them are scary. Talking to them is useless; they simply will not listen.

They're ants, and I've never seen anything like them. The other day, as I ate my chocolate pudding, a small drop landed on the floor. Within an hour, dozens of tiny red ants engulfed the sugary treat, carrying their prize back home. They're crawling everywhere—on my seats, on the walls, and in the bathroom. Back at the University of Massachusetts, a dropped piece of food would remain there petrified and untouched until rediscovery at the end of May.

Other than that, the dorms are a small upgrade, with mini kitchens and bathrooms in each flat. While most of you were lazily sleeping away your summers, I began my junior year abroad at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem at the start of August. Hundreds of students from over 30 countries representing diverse faiths and backgrounds are enrolled here, providing for a very interesting program.

The university also has a unique and impressive history. Founded in the 1920's, at a time when Jews were denied admission to many universities throughout the world, Hebrew U. was a place where Jews could study and thrive. Freud, Einstien, and Buber have all served on the university's board of directors, ensuring its success.

In Israel's 1948 War for Independence the areas surrounding the campus were captured by Jordan, isolating the university and making it unusable until Mount Scopus was liberated in 1967.

Rather than R.A.s, we have security guards. Rather than fraternities, we have fences. Our college sport teams are non-existent, and we lack a school mascot. Rather than uniting under a team, people are connected by the love for Jerusalem, a city that has no rival.

Six mornings a week I begin my five hours of intensive Hebrew study with a 20-minute hike uphill to the campus atop Mount Scopus. On my way I pass the three armed security guards stationed outside my dorm 24/7 to ensure my protection. Just a simple walk to campus is rich in history and mix of cultures. To my right I overlook the beautiful old city of Jerusalem, including the 1300-year-old Al-Aqsa mosque and The Dome of the Rock.

A bit further up my walk is a church and cemetery for the fallen British soldiers of WWI. I continue walking and pass Hadassah Hospital, from where I hear the occasional roar of ambulance sirens. Even the hospital, which serves all, is not immune to terror attacks, and a line of cars waits to enter as security checks every driver and each and every trunk is opened and searched.

Rather than R.A.s, we have security guards. Rather than fraternities, we have fences. Our college sports teams are non-existent, and we lack a school mascot.

I'm only five minutes away when I pass by Aroma, a café chain that helped crush Starbuck's attempt to enter the Israeli marketplace a few years back. It's surrounded by two layers of fences and several armed security guards that search every bag that enters and for good reason. A few weeks ago a Palestinian Hebrew U. student who had been studying here for several years was arrested after it was revealed that he was planning to blow up this very café with students in it.

I jump a bit, startled, as an armed security guard stationed by the bus stop pops out and asks me how I am doing. His eyes quickly scan me to see if I am acting suspicious or nervous, and he lets me continue on my way.

Exhausted, out of breath, and running late as usual, I am postponed by yet another necessary security check upon entering the campus. Scrambling for my ID, I quickly maneuver to open my bag and remove my cell phone and keys from my pockets to avoid setting off the metal detector. Still walking uphill, now within the secure iron gates of the university, I walk amidst Jews, Christians, and Muslims who study together on this campus, which serves as a beacon of co-existence. Some Jews wear their skullcaps or kippas, some Muslim women wear their headscarves, and Christians wear crosses on their necklaces, such things in places like France are not always legal or safe to do.

Security remains a necessity here as the result of a current wave of Palestinian terrorism that has been plaguing the nation. One incident involved a bomb that a Palestinian employee set in this school's cafeteria in the summer of 2002. The bomb killed several students and faculty, including Janis Coulter, a UMass-Amherst graduate, and severely injured many more.

Since then, tight security has been enforced and the end result is that campus is incredibly safe. Instances of campus violence are very rare, and the riots and drunken fights that occasionally plague UMass are unheard of. Even the dorms have bomb shelters, so if Syria or Iran follow through on threats to destroy Israel and send chemical weapons or anthrax into Israel, we could grab the government-issued gas masks and have a quick escape. These are the realities of the region.

Anthrax — exactly what an Israeli mistakenly heard when I asked for the similarly sounding "ant traps." (Much to my disappointment, ant traps are non-existent here.) In the meantime, I initiated a campaign of squishing any ant that entered my line of vision while my Texan roommate applied a slightly different strategy to deal with them: a vicious and relentless use of chemical weapons. His bottle of Raid has killed countless numbers of the little creatures, and I have condemned his use of unconventional weapons. Luckily they have been my one and only problem in Jerusalem.

Northampton gets 'Soul'

Funk/Soul/Jazz trio Soulive to return to Pioneer Valley

In the sea of acoustic guitars and teen-queen pop stars that is modern-day music, Soulive has no trouble standing out. The trio, whose sound isn't quite funk and isn't exactly jazz, may not be a name most mainstream radio fan's are accustom to hearing, but make no mistakes: Soulive is one of the best bands out there right now.

The origins of Soullve lead right to the University of Massachusetts' backyard, where guitarist Eric Krasno attended Hampshire College. A guitar virtuoso, Krasno attended Boston's Berklee College summer program at the age of 14 and was

Comedian Black returns to the Pioneer Valley for 'First Week'

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Typically the days before classes start at the University of Massachusetts are spent getting settled into dorm rooms, becoming familiar with the area and getting reacquainted with the beiruit table or other favorite weekend pastimes. Very rarely is any sort of learning taking place on campus. UMass students who trekked down to the Mullins Center on Monday, however, got a jumpstart on the semester when comedian Lewis Black schooled them on everything from history to political science.

Black, best known for his affiliation with Comedy Central's "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," performed to a crowd of nearly 3,000 strong as part of UMass's "First Week" festivities. Eduardo Bustamante, president of the Student Government Ass-ociation, declared Black's performance the "first event exclusively for UMass students." No stranger to Amherst, Black has performed at UMass before, though the Mullins crowd was much larger than previous outings for the commentator/author/comedian.

For those who had never seen Black on "The Daily Show" and were unfamiliar with his work, the performer began his show with a disclaimer. He warned that some may not like what he had to say and may even find him offensive. His response to this concern? "Tough shit."

"If I am the scariest thing to come into your world," Black said, "then you're going to have a tough life ... Seriously you are up shit's creek without a paddle." With that formality out of the way Black began his routine, an act that falls somewhere between comedic brillance and political genius.

The topic of Black's show was February's infamous Super Bowl halftime show, and the highly over-discussed exposure of Janet Jackson's nipple. From there the comedian spun a rage-filled fury over some of the more ridiculous recent current events.

"The folks at CBS were somehow surprised when MTV couldn't produce a family friendly half-time show," observed Black, who went on to blast the media's constant chatter about the nipple and the moral judgement passed on it.

"Everyone was worried about the kids ... but when I was a nine-year-old boy all I wanted to see was titties," Black screamed.

Not just Janet's nipple was under fire. No one, not even presidential hopeful John Kerry, or even members of the audience itself, was safe from Black's antagonism.

Among topics that Black focused a great deal of his energy on were gay marriage, President Bush and the Atkins Diet. The topic of gay marriage struck a particular nerve with Black, who could not help but comment on the absurdity of a Constitutional amendment banning gay marriage. Citing separation of church and state, the comedian pointed out how ludicrous it is for the

Sampling comes under fire

By John Gerome
Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that rap artists should pay for every musical sample included in their work — even minor, unrecognizable snippets of music.

Lower courts had already ruled that artists must pay when they sample another artists' work. But it has been legal to use musical snippets — a note here, a chord there — as long as it wasn't identifiable.

The decision by a three-judge panel of the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati gets rid of that distinction. The court said federal laws aimed at stopping piracy of recordings applies to digital sampling.

"If you cannot pirate the whole sound recording, can you 'lift' or 'sample' something less than the whole? Our answer to that question is in the negative," the court said.

"Get a license or do not sample. We do not see this as stifling creativity in any significant way."

Some observers questioned whether the court's opinion is too restrictive, especially for rap and hip-hop artists who often rhyme over samples of music taken from older recordings.

"It seems a little extreme to me," said James Van Hook, dean of Belmont University's Mike Curb College of Entertainment and Music Business. "When something is identifiable, that is the key."

The case at issue is one of at least 800 lawsuits filed in Nashville over lifting snippets of music from older recordings for new music.

The case centers on the NWA song "100 Miles and Runnin," which samples a three-note guitar riff from "Get Off Your Ass and Jam" by '70s funk-master George Clinton and Funkadelic.

In the two-second sample, the guitar pitch has been lowered, and the copied piece was "looped" and extended to 16 beats. The sample appears five times in the new song.

NWA's song was included in the 1998 movie "I Got the Hook Up," starring Master P and produced by his movie company, No Limit Films.

No Limit Films has argued that the sample was not protected by copyright law. Bridgeport Music and Westbound Records, which claim to own the copyrights for the Funkadelic song, appealed the lower court's summary judgment in favor of No Limit Films.

The lower court in 2002 said that the riff in Clinton's song was entitled to copyright protection, but the sampling "did not rise to the level of legally cognizable appropriation."

The appeals court disagreed, saying a recording artist who acknowledges sampling may be liable, even when the source of a sample is unrecognizable.

Noting that No Limit Films "had not disputed that it digitally sampled a copyrighted sound recording," the appeals court sent the case back to the lower court.

Hammond hosts Emmys

Hammond

NEW YORK — He won't be live from New York, but he will be on tape.

"Saturday Night Live" cast member Darrell Hammond has been tapped to host the 25th annual news and documentary Emmy Awards.

Unlike "SNL," the ceremony won't be live from New York. Instead, it will be taped at the Marriott Marquis Hotel on Sept. 13 and then telecast on Sept. 25 on the Discovery Times Channel.

"We are pleased to have Darrell Hammond join these prestigious news personalities at this year's celebration," Peter Price, president of the National Television Academy, said Tuesday. "Mr. Hammond brings the special credential of having impersonated many of America's most prominent newsmakers and newscasters."

Peter Jennings, Diane Sawyer, Wolf Blitzer, Brian Williams and Dan Rather will present awards. Rather is among many newsmen and political pundits Hammond has imitated during his eight-season run on NBC's "SNL." He's taken on almost everyone in the Bush administration (Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, John Ashcroft, Colin Powell, Tom Ridge), and is well known for his portrayal of former President Bill Clinton.

Franz takes the prize

LONDON — Scottish rockers Franz Ferdinand, whose debut album has been hailed by critics as a masterpiece of pop, won the prestigious Mercury Music Prize. The Glasgow-based quartet were the favorites among the 12-strong shortlist to take home the award for their self-titled album.

The $35,600 prize, now in its 13th year, honors the best album of the year by a British or Irish band. It is judged on talent and innovation rather than commercial sales, and the winner can usually expect a surge in sales and publicity.

Among the acts Franz Ferdinand beat for the prize, announced Tuesday, were two-time nominee The Streets, aka rapper Mike Skinner; young soul sensation Joss Stone; urban star Jamelia; and guitarless rock band Keane.

The shortlist was rounded out by new rockers The Zutons, jazz singer Amy Winehouse, Northern Irish quartet Snow Patrol, dance outfit Basement Jaxx, pop group Belle & Sebastian, rapper Ty and singer Robert Wyatt.

The 'King 'of lawsuits

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Disney Enterprises may have to sell its trademarks in South Africa to pay for damages if a poor family wins a lawsuit claiming it lost millions in royalties from the hit song "The Lion Sleeps Tonight."

The Pretoria High Court on Tuesday dismissed an application by Disney Enterprises to prevent its trademarks from being sold off if the family of the late musician Solomon Linda, who wrote the original song, "Mbube," in 1939, wins its suit.

Lawyers for Linda's family obtained a court order in July attaching more than 240 trademarks registered here to their $1.6 million lawsuit in order to establish local jurisdiction.

The trademarks, which include well-known images such as Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck, could be sold locally to pay Linda's heirs if they win their lawsuit, according to Tuesday's ruling.

Linda's three surviving daughters and 10 grandchildren, living in poverty in the Johannesburg township of Soweto, have received only a one-time payment of $15,000, according to their lawyers.

"It means that Mickey Mouse is still in captivity," said Adri Malan, spokesman for the family's legal team.

Joyce Lorigan, a London-based spokeswoman for Disney, said the judgment Tuesday was disappointing, but had no impact on the substance of the dispute.

"The real issue in this lawsuit is whether Linda's estate or Abilene Music Publishing — who bought the rights to the song from Linda's wife — owns the copyright to 'The Lion Sleeps Tonight,'" Lorigan said in a statement.

The action is based on laws in Commonwealth nations at the time the song was first recorded. Under these provisions, the rights to a song revert to the composer's heirs 25 years after his death.

No court date has been set.

Linda died penniless in 1962, having sold the rights to his original song to the South African company Abilene Music Publishing. It went on to generate an estimated $15 million in royalties after it was adapted by other artists, including the American songwriter George Weiss, whose version is featured in "The Lion King."

The song has been covered by at least 150 artists, including The Tokens, George Michael, Miriam Makeba and The Spinners.

Hours, minutes & Moore

NEW YORK — Julianne Moore wants to give children more time for their imaginations — and she's doing it one watch at a time.

The 43-year-old actress will appear in a public service campaign bearing the slogan, "Time is Precious: Use it Wisely," seeking to highlight the declining resources available for children's arts education programs and reverse the trend.

With each purchase of a Montblanc watch or pen, the luxury accessory brand will make a contribution to the National Arts Education Initiative, a program of the Entertainment Industry Foundation (EIF).

Moore

The campaign will run in fashion and lifestyle publications starting in October and continue until next March.

Moore has received four Oscar nominations, including best actress nominations for 2002's "Far From Heaven" and 1999's "The End of the Affair," and best supporting actress nominations for 2002's "The Hours" and 1997's "Boogie Nights." Her next film, "The Forgotten," opens Sept. 24.

The EIF is the official charity of the entertainment industry. It also sponsors initiatives for cancer research, cardiovascular research and cessation of smoking.

Montblanc is a nearly century-old designer of jewelry and stationery.

Black gets last laugh at Mullins

United States government to try to use the Constitution to prevent same-sex relationships.

At several points during the show Black had to ask members of the audience to refrain from screaming things out. "It will go a lot easier," he said, "if when I ask the questions, I answer them." Most in attendance were able to control themselves however a few struggled with Black's request. After Black again asked a certain audience member to be quiet, the attendee replied, "You suck! Stop." Most performers would ignore the heckler but Lewis Black proved yet again that he is not one to be messed with. "You know, sir, I am the only one on tonight. There's no one after me," he snapped. "No tap dancing or singing, and I'm not going to do any of that mime shit you're into ... so if you don't like it there is a very simple solution — leave! There's the door." With that the crowd burst into cheers.

Black's true genius lies in his delivery. The man can say anything and phrase it in such a way that listeners feel like idiots themselves for not having thought of it sooner. Yet Black's mission is not to degrade the audience. He seemed aware that he was preaching to the converted. His delivery highlights the sheer idiocy of the world that we live in.

Unfortunately the same cannot be said for opener Kjell Bjorgen. For him, his act was a perfect example of the sheer idiocy Black blasts on a regular basis. The up-and-coming comedian fared slightly better than Mission Improvable at the Mullins Center, but failed to earn the spot he had been given before Black. Bjorgen started his act commenting on his unusual name, which was entertaining for all of two seconds before it got old.

As Bjorgen's time on stage wore on, his act got weaker and weaker. A bit about his twin brother's success in life was worth a few laughs, but his punchline (framing a DUI ticket) was low-brow at best. Bjorgen talked about prozac and marijuana, discussed physical barriers that keep him from getting chicks (though yeast infections of the face and cold sores were on the list, surprisingly lack of talent wasn't) and though there were some laughs, Bjorgen's lowest-common-denominator brand of comedy wasn't fit to share the stage with Lewis Black.

hooked on music from then on. In Boston, Krasno met up with a varied group of musicians, all of whom helped shape his musical philosophy. The official Soulive website, www.soulive.com, describes the experience as a turning point in Krasno's playing style. "From then on, everything Eric played, whether it was jazz, soul, or blues was steeped in funk."

As Krasno's skills grew so did his reputation. In March of 1999, Krasno, already a Hampshire alum, hooked up with brothers Alan and Neal Evans, who he had met back in his days in Amherst. With Alan Evans on drums, Neal Evans on keys and Krasno on strings a band was born.

Taking the indie route, Soulive released a handful of records independently and hit the road. The unparalled success of their first LP, "Turn it Out," (the album has sold over 65,000 copies with no help from a label) solidified Soulive as force in the music world. Their funkified sound caught the attention of some of the industries most heralded names among them Dave Matthews, Talib Kweli and The Roots, who all appeared on the trio's most commercial successful release to date, "Next."

Tonight Soulive will return to the Pioneer Valley to play a show at Northampton's Pearl Street Ballroom. Though this is not the first show the group has played in Northampton, it does mark an important step in the band's evolving career. With the close of their contract with Blue Note Records in spring of 2003, Soulive has set their sights on creating the "definitive soul record for the twenty-first century."

Those that are familiar with Soulive's sound will enjoy the chance to hear a show comprised of old favorites as well as new material. As the band continues to play together their canon continues to grow and the arsenal of songs they unleash for audiences becomes more and more impressive.

For those that are unfamiliar with the soulful trio, fear not. A Soulive show is not exclusively for diehard fans; all you need is a love of music and an open mind. The nature of Soulive's music is such that each performance is a unique entity. Newbies and seasoned fans alike will have the chance to enjoy the Soulive experience.

The show is at 8:30 p.m. at the Pearl Street Ballroom. Tickets are $14 in advance, $17 at the door.

This fall, change your life: change your mind.

'Napoleon' gets by without plot

main character in a film that gets more odd in every scene.

The plot follows Napoleon through his daily routines, essentially his being, complete with tucked in t-shirts and a red Afro. The monotony that is the life of Napoleon Dynamite is not only entertaining, but also riotously funny.

The story begins in Preston, Idaho where Napoleon lives with his Grandmother (Sandy Martin) and his 30-year-old brother, Kip (Aaron Ruell) who is unemployed and spends most of his day conversing with his internet girlfriend, LaFawnduh (Shondrella Avery). While no explanation is given for why the two brothers live with their grandmother, the details prove to not to be necessary. Napoleon also tends to the family pet, a goat named Tina.

After being seriously injured while practicing some quad runner stunt tricks, their grandmother is hospitalized, leaving the two boys home alone. While both are of age to care for themselves, the grandmother insists that their egotistical uncle Rico (Jon Gries) comes to stay with the boys. Uncle Rico is every door-to-door salesman that you have ever met. He constantly pines for the past, even at one point purchasing a "time machine" off the Internet. Gries plays the character with a bravado and scumminess that leave viewers squirming at times and cracking up at others.

Meanwhile Napoleon is desperately trying to fit in at school despite his indomitable attitude and graceless behavior. School scenes depict the gangly Dynamite punching at a swinging tetherball and in another scene performing a sign language routine to the Bette Midler tune, "The Rose." Moments like these prove to be worth the $5.75 for admission in themselves.

Napoleon meets his sidekick, the incoming foreign exchange student, Pedro (Efren Ramirez) as the lethargic newcomer is trying to find his classroom. He leads him to his class and the two begin a friendship that is as hilarious as it is simple. Both characters are men of few words and even fewer talents.

Despite his social challenges, Pedro asks the prettiest girl, (the Rachel Leigh Cook-esque character of the film) Summer (Haylie Duff), to the prom. He decides to bake her a cake and mark in his proposal to go to the dance together in the icing. She rudely denies him, but Pedro is undeterred and instead decides to ask out the girl that Napoleon has set his eyes on, the reticent Deb (Tina Majorino).

Following the dance, Pedro comes to a decision that he will run against Summer for the position of the president of the student body. Summer very obviously has the popular vote of her class, but the tag-team of Napoleon and Pedro begin a creative campaign to defeat the Preston Princess. Pedro even creates a piñata in the likeness of Summer and allows students to take jabs at her candy-filled face.

All in all, the film is intelligent, dissident, and exceptionally sarcastic. While the characters are humorous, the movie also creates a tender tone that draws the viewer to the plight of Heder's character.

The husband and wife team of director Jared and producer Jerusha Hess have succeeded in creating what is sure to garner the label of "cult hit." The combination of simplicity, absurdity, poignancy and attention to detail has drawn comparisons to such great films as "Rushmore" and "Harold and Maude."

Heder, immersed in the representation of Napoleon, could not have been better. The Brigham Young University student is sure to be heard of again in the future, even if his performance will be likened to one hit wonders like Dustin Diamond's character, Screech from the 1990's television hit, "Saved By the Bell."

In a surprising note, Haylie Duff, younger sister of "Lizzie McGuire" star Hilary Duff, shines in her performance as Summer Wheatley. In a time when the family thing is overdone, (think Hiltons, Olsens, Simpsons) Duff separates herself from her sister, proving that she can act, and do so well. Granted this was not a role that would require coaching from Meryl Streep, but she thankfully did not attend the Mandy Moore School of pop star acting.

"Napoleon Dynamite" is refreshing. Every so often and independent movie makes it mainstream, and even less often are these movies successful. Thankfully, due to accomplishment of the Hess team, MTV signed on to this production and now America can experience, the life of the super-nerd, Napoleon Dynamite.

Magician Roy Horn focus of special following his recovery

By Adam Goldman
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — Roy Horn has never spoken publicly about the incident in which a 380-pound white tiger named Montecore nearly mauled him to death.

So when NBC airs the special "Siegfried & Roy: The Miracle" at 9 p.m. EDT Sept. 15, viewers will hear Horn for the first time and see his battle to regain his motor skills after the tiger attack — and subsequent debilitating stroke — left him in a wheelchair.

"That's been the remarkable part of this thing," said Jason Raff, the show's executive producer and director. "He really let us in to see the good days and bad days. I believe they gave us an unprecedented look."

In his own words, Raff said, Horn will attempt to answer what happened that terrifying night during a live performance at The Mirage hotel-casino on the Las Vegas Strip. He'll be interviewed by Maria Shriver in one of her first TV assignments since becoming California's first lady.

Raff told The Associated Press he's not going to reveal what Horn had to say.

"That I'm going to save for the special," Raff said. "That's his thing. He wants to say it himself."

But viewers shouldn't expect the definitive account. "We will offer a very thorough look," Raff said. "Will we answer every question? No. We will not answer every question."

As Shriver noted in an interview with the AP, "No one is 100 percent sure what happened that night."

The special probably won't include the closely guarded footage of the Oct. 3 accident that was taped by Feld Entertainment, the company that produced the wildly popular Siegfried & Roy show. Feld officials have refused to turn over the video to investigators from the Agriculture Department, the federal agency responsible for looking into such incidents, saying it "would quickly end up in the hands of media who would then sensationalize this horrible tragedy."

Raff said he pieced together the events leading up to the mauling and the dramatic days that came after it.

"To the best of our ability, we do a moment-by-moment account with lots of information that hasn't been reported yet," he said.

The special, produced by the network's entertainment division, includes interviews with some of the 1,500 audience members and show staff who witnessed the horrifying attack, as well as the paramedics who treated Horn in those first crucial minutes.

The tiger bit Horn in the neck and dragged him off stage. One of the show's employees was able to beat the animal off Horn by hitting it with a fire extinguisher. Horn is said to have lost a tremendous amount of blood.

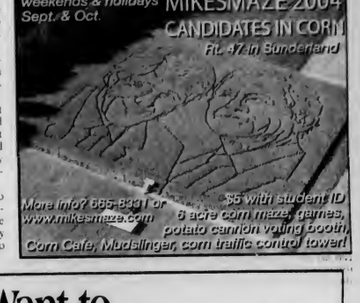
The more dramatic moments of the special are expected to include audio tapes of the 911 calls and conversations between hospital staffers and paramedics as Horn was being rushed to the emergency room. It was his 59th birthday. Horn had to undergo repeated surgeries after he arrived at University Medical Center. Horn gave doctors permission to disclose his medical information for the special, Raff said.

"He was very close to dying from what the doctors said," Raff explained. "The first three days were truly touch and go. We are going to let the doctors tell what happened."

While Horn stayed off death in those first 72 hours, Raff said partner Siegfried Fischbacher had to make "some very quick decisions, life-saving decisions" about whether doctors should perform those potentially dangerous operations.

The program was filmed over several months, mostly in Las Vegas, where Horn and Shriver, a longtime friend of Horn's, visit a caged Montecore.

There are also scenes at a Denver rehabilitation clinic for stroke victims. Raff said Horn has gone through "grueling therapy."



Shriver said Horn is doing remarkably better, but it's not clear if he'll ever perform again. There's no talk of reviving the Siegfried & Roy show, which debuted in 1990, although Siegfried & Roy are involved in NBC's new animated show "Father of the Pride." Still, doctors described Horn's survival as a miracle.

"This is a guy who had come back from the impossible," Shriver said. "He has defied everybody's single belief that he would be here today."

goal of his own less than three minutes later, off of a free kick set up by a Massachusetts penalty.

In the second round of play, Santa Clara went on to defeat UC Davis by a score of 4-1, and claim the Diadora crown.

It wasn't until UMass Freshman Tyler Pagano netted the first goal of his collegiate career against San Francisco, that the Maroon and White had something to cheer about.

Down 2-0, Pagano maneuvered around the defense and scored on a turnaround shot deep in Don territory.

Pagano's goal cut the deficit in half at 71:44, but San Francisco capped off the scoring two minutes later with a goal from Aaron Chandler.

UMass goalie Colin Burns recorded six saves in the loss, while his counterpart, Geremy Uhl, responded with five.

During the Aug. 28 exhibition between UMass and Notre Dame, Burns and Billman split time between the pipes and kept the game scoreless with two saves apiece.

Ninth-ranked Notre Dame fluttered against a cohesive UMass defense, managing to put only six shots on goal.

A week prior to Notre Dame, Massachusetts showcased its abilities in victory over the University of Montreal. Fueled by a pair of second half goals from junior Oral Bullen, the Maroon and White surged after a first half stalemate.

Bullen's two goals came in the final 13 minutes of play, leading the Minutemen to their only victory thus far.

Freshman Gred Cirillo sparked the offense when he kicked home an assist from teammate Kenneth Cook early in the second half.

Cook gained control of a loose ball during a melee in front of the Montreal goal and sent a pass in Bullen's direction.

Blocked from seeing the shot by players scrambling to get back into position, the Montreal goalkeeper did not have time to react to Cirillo's shot that made its way through the unintentional screen.

The Minutemen return to Rudd Field Saturday, where they have played to a 12-3-2 record since 2002.

UM struggles in early going

Despite the loss, head coach Jim Rudy seemed pleased with the team's effort and progress. Rudy singled out the strong play the team has been getting from the freshmen class early in the season. "The freshmen are carrying us right now," Rudy said.

Last Friday the Minutewomen turned in a lackluster performance against Yale in front of a home crowd at Rudd Field. The game got off to a good start though for the Maroon and White as Bellini put UMass on the board ten minutes into the contest.

Canfield sparked the play by firing a shot from just inside the penalty area. The Yale goalie couldn't control the rebound and Bellini deposited the ball into the back of the net to give UMass its first lead of the season.

It was all Yale from that point on though. The Bulldogs would score four goals that UMass could not answer. Walker recorded seven saves on the day, but was hindered by a shaky defense which allowed Yale forwards to get in alone numerous times.

Yale knotted the score five minutes after Bellini's goal and scored a critical goal with under a minute remaining in the first half.

"You could see we were playing to get through halftime with a tie," Rudy said. "Everyone relaxed, and it shouldn't be that way."

The Bulldogs padded their lead with a goal with 31:17 left in the game and sealed the victory with yet another goal seven minutes later.

UMass had scoring chances, but was unable to capitalize on their opportunities. Midway through the first half Canfield and senior Lindsey Fairweather broke out on a 2-on-1 break. Canfield slipped a pass to Fairweather but her shot from 18 yards sailed wide.

Early in the second half freshman Caitlin Footit blasted a shot from the center of the area off the cross bar. Fairweather collected the rebound in front of the net, but her bid was deflected over the net.

Rudy was at a loss for answers as to why the team is off to a slow start, but said the returning players are going to need to step up their play if the team is to turn things around. Rudy remains optimistic about the chances for a turnaround.

"Last year we started 2-0 and then we collapsed," he said. "So maybe this is just the opposite. We'll start 0-2 (now 0-3) and then kick it into gear."

The Minutewomen hope to start to kick it into gear this weekend when they visit the New Hampshire Wildcats.

Selig able to solve Yankees 'problem'

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Now that the Devil Rays have quit lollygagging, the Yankees' hissy fit is behind them and the game in question is back on the schedule, it's time to address the last bit of business left over from major league baseball's version of "Travelgate."

Namely, Bud Selig's bonus.

Yeah, you read that right. The commissioner deserves a little something extra in his pay envelope this week for keeping his hat on while all those around him were talking through theirs.

Granted, Selig didn't have to channel King Solomon to come up with a solution. The facts begged for a common-sense decision, and all the commissioner did was draw one up. He ordered Monday's postponed game to be made up as part of a doubleheader Wednesday. That doesn't appear to be a tough decision — until you consider that Selig made it despite having Yankee boss George Steinbrenner pressing down on his shoulder blades and screaming into both ears about fair play.

Some background:

The Devil Rays arrived in New York a half-day too late to play the first game of Monday's scheduled doubleheader. They said they were stuck in Tampa Bay that morning because of travel restrictions, and didn't leave earlier because they had to stay home and look after their families as Hurricane Frances bore down on the area.

The Yankees sneered back that the Devil Rays should have left earlier, all but suggesting they would have if Tampa Bay owner Vince Naimoli, a notorious cheapskate, had been willing to pick up the tab for a charter flight and a few extra nights in a pricey Manhattan hotel. Instead, the Yankees spent most of Monday sitting around waiting, while their fans wandered the stands consuming free food.

Naturally, Steinbrenner wanted someone to pay – not necessarily for the $180 million in salary sitting idle in his clubhouse, but likely for the 25,836 hot dogs and 25,296 sodas his concessionaires had to give away. And this was The Boss' idea of compassion: enforce the letter of the game's law: make Tampa Bay forfeit the game.

If that seems desperate and self-serving, well, that's probably because there's no better words to describe it. The Yankees have been in a tailspin the last three weeks, coughing up most of what was a 10 1/2-game lead over their American League East rival and mortal enemy, the Boston Red Sox.

The top of New York's pitching rotation has been disastrous, a fact punctuated when Kevin Brown broke his non-pitching hand punching a wall in frustration Friday night. Given that situation, think a win without breaking a sweat sounded too good to be true?

The Red Sox and just about everybody else with a passing interest in baseball did. At least this once, Selig went along.

"As the commissioner made clear," MLB's chief operating officer, Bob DuPuy, said in a statement Tuesday, "it is critical that the outcome of the pennant races be determined on the field."

In that sense, the Devil Rays could hardly be more gracious guests. They stepped off the plane an hour before Monday's 7 p.m. first pitch and sleepwalked their way to a 7-4 loss. Without jet lag as an excuse — and Tampa Bay is so bad, alibis are usually superfluous — they went down 11-2 Tuesday night.

About the only thing the Devil Rays have done to anger their hosts so far is insist they did the right thing by staying away in the first place.

Athletic secondary to lead defense for UMass scrimmage, looking for a challenge, and we don't ever want to be beat.

"We want to be out there against the other team's best guy and prove that we can shut him down."

The secret weapon in UMass' ball hawking five-some is Belton, a sophomore who posted four interceptions during his freshman campaign and came on strong during the team's late season run in 2003.

With Costello, the reigning conference leader in interceptions and Cobbs, very much a known quantity, the Landover, Md. native will be called upon to keep pace with the position's elder statesman and make an immediate impact in nickel packages — a task Brown feels he is up to.

"Tracy Belton is the real deal," the coach said. "He's going to do a lot of good things for us, and that makes us that much deeper back there."

"With him and Steve and R.J., I think we have three guys who are absolutely the real deal. Those three guys have been excellent and will make us very tough."

In reality, tough may be most aptly used to describe the team's dynamite pair of safeties. A three-year starter who learned the world from McKenzie, Shannon James added ten pounds of solid muscle in the off-season to help him continue to gain the runaway train reputation Ihedigbo has already begun to establish. He totaled 211 tackles over the last two seasons at both safety and corner, including 80 solo stops in each of the campaigns, and made the play of the year when he returned a fumble 39 yards for a touchdown in a thrilling 19-13 win at Villanova.

Ihedigbo, meanwhile, received the Vic Fuscia Award as the team's most improved defensive player after recording 74 tackles, four interceptions, three fumble recoveries and two forced fumbles. Brown hopes he will fit in perfectly as the team's resident assassin, and Ihedigbo relishes the opportunity to play the run and deliver what he calls "kill shots."

"When I hit someone, I want them to feel it in their soul," he said. "I want their mother to feel it ... and I'm going to let them know about it on the field."

"If I get a guy once, they'll know I'm going to get them again and they're going to hear it from me. I'll say 'I got you and I'll be here all day.'"

Nonetheless, what may serve the group best when they step onto the field is their cohesiveness. With the consistent pushing, working with and confiding in each other during camp, there is already a bond growing between the five, albeit a competitive one.

James (No. 6) and Ihedigbo (No. 7) changed numbers to join Costello (No. 1) and Cobbs (No. 3) in the single digits. Belton (No. 26) is the only holdout, refusing to give up the number of his childhood hero Rod Woodson. There is also a friendly competition to see who can intercept the most passes during the 2004 season, after the group combined for 18 in 2003.

Thus for Brown, the talent and desire to succeed and improve is certainly there amongst his highly touted secondary. After all, it's been nearly seven months in the making.

"We've been pleased with their effort and enthusiasm and feel like we have the talent, especially in the defensive backfield," Brown said.

"Can we come together right away? That's what's going to be on me and that's what we're trying to get done, but at the very least, we've got five guys that compete, work hard and love to play football.

"That's all we can ask for out of them."

goal. Crystal Frates earned her first career goal at 16:02, the final score of the game.

The Eagles dominated much of the play during the game, outshooting Massachusetts 27-4. BC also had the edge in penalty corners, 12-2.

Senior Massachusetts goalie Christine Tocco managed a season-high 15 saves against the Eagles, but was unable to secure a victory. Jillian Savoy made two saves for Boston College.

On Sunday, Harvard came to Garber Field for the UMass home opener. Senior Adrianne Monaco put Massachusetts on the scoreboard first, with 18:27 to go in the first half. In a striking similarity to the BC game, the Crimson responded within the next two minutes to tie the game. On a penalty corner attempt by Julie Lane, Tocco made a save, but the ensuing scuffle resulted in a penalty stroke being awarded to Harvard. Tamara Sobek-Rosnick attempted the shot for the Crimson, and managed to beat Tocco to the corner of the net.

Assisted by Jen McDavitt, Laura Werner scored the game-winner three minutes later, fresh off of a Minutewoman turnover. McDavitt also earned assists on both insurance goals. Julie Lane scored at the 31:09 mark, for the final score in the first half.

UMass did not manage any shots in the second half, with play dominated by Harvard. However, on her way to earning 14 saves, Tocco only allowed one goal in the second half, earned by Shelley Maasdorp off a penalty corner set up by McDavitt.

The Crimson outshot the Maroon and White, 25-3, and took nine penalty corners to UMass' zero.

The Minutewomen are back on the road this weekend, traveling to College Park, Maryland, where they will face Maryland on Saturday and American University on Sunday.

Swagger evident in secondary

Talented unit to lead Don Brown's new UMass defense

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Don Brown's introduction as head football coach at the University of Massachusetts was nearing its conclusion when an unexpected hand went up in the back of the Mullins Center green room.

There was James Ihedigbo, fresh off a phenomenal freshman campaign that saw him snag four interceptions, begging to be called on as if he were back in grammar school.

This was a press conference. His chance to ask all the questions that he wanted to would come later, but the Amherst Regional product needed to know, and he needed to know now, "What kind of defenses are we going to run, coach?" he asked.

To Brown's credit, he answered the unofficial inquiry to the fullest, addressing reporters and his new players in attendance about fronts, packages and schemes and what he does in various scenarios. It was his first step in the long process of establishing credibility with his new group, and for Ihedigbo it was exactly what he had hoped for.

Ihedigbo, the first starting strong safety in recent memory not named McKenzie, was just one integral part of possibly the best defensive backfield in the Atlantic 10. Luckily, his new coach wanted to attack, cause havoc and never let up. The tone for the 2004 season had been set, and it was only Feb. 9.

"Coach Brown is a defensive genius," Ihedigbo said. "His system suits the speed and the athletes we have on this team so well, and it's all about getting after the quarterback and letting us man up on the wide receivers and get physical with them. We have the talent to just shut teams down."

Brown, meanwhile, relies on the influence of some former stalwarts of the McGuirk trenches to continue to preach his prowess as a defensive mind to the talent that is already in place.

"I think the one thing that's been good is that I've coached a lot of the older guys; the Jeremy Cains and the Anton McKenzies, and I think they've helped me in the credibility piece," the former Northeastern boss said. "That helps me in sending a message to some of the younger guys that I'm OK.

"We've got to sell our system. We have to sell our philosophy and the way we go about doing things on both sides of the ball, and that's a day-to-day challenge that I'm excited about. It's one of the reasons that I came back here, to instill my system here and just see how it plays itself out."

Yet make no mistake, while Brown will have input in new offensive coordinator Kevin Morris' ball-control offense, his heart and soul will be thrust into an aggressive, lightning-quick defense that doesn't quit — a unit built around five of the best athletes on the team.

Under former defensive coordinator Tom Masella, the Minutemen controlled the line of scrimmage out of a 3-4 alignment and were unbreakable against the run. Now, having lost a tremendous amount of talent and experience along the defensive line and at linebacker, Brown will switch to a 4-3 and rely heavily on dynamic secondary to allow his young guys to get their feet wet.

"If those guys [in the defensive backfield] are talented, it allows you to be more flexible with your fronts," Brown said. "In reality, with six or seven new front guys, it allows us to do what we have to do to help those guys out and put more pressure on the back edge of the shell to get things done.

"With those guys out there I have a lot of confidence that we'll be up to the one-on-one challenge."

Confidence, however, is not a problem amongst cornerbacks Steve Costello, R.J. Cobbs and Tracy Belton and safeties Shannon James and Ihedigbo. Individually, they are pure playmakers in numerous facets of the game. As a group, the possibilities are endless and the unfettered ability to dominate is clearly evident.

"We have the best secondary in the Atlantic 10, without a doubt in my mind," Cobbs said. "Myself and Steve Costello love to get up in receivers' faces and get our hands on them. We thrive on the one-on-one challenge and want that responsibility all game long."

Cobbs, of course, was the Atlantic 10 Offensive Rookie of the Year in 2002 after rushing for 1,067 yards and 14 touchdowns. Now, with the Maroon and White boasting a plethora of talent at tailback, one of the nation's most electrifying players is returning to his natural position to give Brown another dependable, lock-down cover man.

"From a talent standpoint, I've coached a lot of corners over my 28 years and I'd have to say he's in that upper echelon – that one percent or two percent," Brown said of Cobbs. "He's got a great knack of being a physical corner and likes the physical aggressive challenge."

Costello picked off six passes in an All-Conference 2003 campaign, and was a pre-season All-Conference honoree this season as well after establishing himself as the A-10's premier cornerback.

"We each have the ability to take receivers out of the game," Costello said. "[R.J.] and I are very similar in the fact that we're both always up on the line of scrimmage, looking for a chal-for 144 yards and a pair of touchdowns. It was the fifth 100-yard receiving game of the senior captain's career and helped him move into fourth place on UMass' career receiving yards list.

Freshman tailback Bryan Smith lead the rushing attack for UMass, gaining 65 yards on eight carries. Junior Steve Baylark also chipped in with 57 yards on eight carries, while starter Rich Demers carried four times for 24 yards.

UMass, which took a 28-0 lead into the locker room at halftime, forced Delaware State to punt after just three plays on the first drive of the third quarter. Hornets kicker Eric Cortes lined up to punt from deep in his own end zone and UMass' Brandon London broke through the line and blocked the kick. Freshman defensive back Brandon Freeman emerged from a pile of players with the loose football for a touchdown, giving the Minutemen a 35-0 edge.

UMass scored again less than four minutes later when freshman tailback Bryan Smith broke tree down the sideline for a 37-yard touchdown run to make the score 42-0 with 8:52 to play in the third.

The Minutemen then completed their scoring with a trio of field goals. Sophomore Michael Torres connected from 38 yards and senior Matt Goldstein made kicks of 31 and 32 yards.

"It was a very solid win for us and I'm just proud of my football team," Brown said. "I've never been at that vantage point in my 28 years of coaching, so I'd be less than forthright if I said I enjoyed it, but I certainly enjoyed the outcome."

After forcing the Hornets to punt on their initial possession, UMass wasted no time in getting on the scoreboard when Day found junior tight end Mike Douglas with a 9-yard touchdown pass at the 5:18 mark of the first quarter.

Day then found Peebler for a 14-yard touchdown pass that pushed the UMass lead to 14-0.

The Minutemen capped their first half scoring on the first play of their third offensive possession, when Day found Peebler on a fade route with a perfectly thrown ball down the sideline that the senior captain took 80 yards for the third UMass score of the afternoon.

during a record-setting romp through its regular season schedule, losing only to I-A Kansas State and eventual I-AA Champion Delaware, and were deserving of a home game in the Division I-AA Playoffs. Instead they were sent spiraling into one of the worst travesties in school history.

Call it crying, excuse making or sour grapes; this journalist could care less, because what happened on Nov. 29, 2003 was just plain wrong. On that afternoon, the Minutemen had more total offense, rushing yards and first downs. They had five fewer punts, a better third-down conversion rating and fewer penalties. They held Walter Payton Award winner Jamaal Branch to just 39 yards on 25 carries and while Gate fans blame that on the conditions, UMass' Steve Baylark was able to gain 84 yards on five fewer carries in the same stuff. Go figure.

UMass was the better team that afternoon. The team was victimized by a sequence of circumstances unprecedented in collegiate athletics. Circumstances that were only vindicated when Delaware just three weeks removed from slipping past UMass in triple overtime, went a long way in reinforcing the injustice with a 40-0 romp over Colgate in the I-AA title game.

Nonetheless, it's a new year and the time for redemption is here. On Saturday night, before a season opening crowd, band director George Parks' drum line will march into McGuirk Alumni Stadium, and the fun will begin. The new Maroon and White will have their crack at the Raiders on a fair and even playing surface, and the better team will ultimately prevail, once and for all.

There will be no travel, no snow and no wind. The ball won't slip out of the hands of Minutemen four separate times. Michael Torres won't narrowly miss breaking his leg on a field goal attempt, and an official blinded by 25 feet of blustery snow won't throw a flag on a third-and-long he didn't even see.

So, there won't be a thing going wrong for UMass on this night. With new coach Don Brown watching from the press box, the 2004 Minutemen will prove that revenge is actually a dish best served warm, on a late summer night, under the lights.

From the moment they arrive in the Pioneer Valley this weekend, Dick Biddle's Red Raiders will not stand a chance because this UMass team is out for the blood they smelled 10 months ago, and when it's all said and done, they will earn the victory they so rightfully deserve. That's a guarantee.

defending national runners-up, and carry with them a No. 4 overall ranking. Nonetheless, many members of the Maroon and White feel as though they were, and still are, the superior team and they will look to prove that on the field.

"I've still got a bitter taste in my mouth about what happened last year," junior safety Shannon James said. "I know we were the better team and we've waited a long time for our chance to prove that.

"Coach (Don) Brown already said that he won't have to say anything before that game. If you're not ready to play, there's something wrong."

"There's something down deep that each one of us has," Sophomore strong safety James Ihedigbo added. "There are guys on this team that have been waiting for this game for a long time, and [the Raiders] are going to feel something."

Offensively Colgate is led by a trio of talented skill players, including Walter Payton Award Winner Jamaal Branch. The 6-foot, 225-pound senior tailback rushed for 2,346 total yards in 2003, including 5.2 yards per carry and 145.4 yards per game, but was shut down by the Maroon and White in the teams' playoff match up.

Thus, it will be very important for Brown's defense to be able to contain the run throughout the game in order to keep the Raiders' offense in check.

"Branch isn't a flashy guy, but after awhile you look up and he has 100 yards," Brown said. "We need to be able to hit him early and often and keep him from wearing us down as the game goes along."

Equally as important to the 'Gate's offensive machine is multi-talented quarterback Chris Brown, who started all 16 games for Biddle in 2003 and was awarded the Andy Kerr Award as the team's most valuable offensive player after completing 223 of 395 passes for 2,832 yards and 22 touchdowns while running 154 times for 453 yards and nine touchdowns.

In his two seasons as a starter, the tri-captain boasts an 18-1 record with the lone blemish being a 40-0 loss to Delaware in last year's national championship game. He has teamed with fellow captain and senior wide receiver Luke Graham to form a very potent passing attack.

Graham, a second All-Patriot League selection for the team, is third in school history with 151 receptions, fourth with 2,448 total receiving yards and has also caught a pass in 30 consecutive games.

"We respect every football team we play and Colgate has a very good one. Our guys know that," Brown said. "We just need to execute our game plan on the field and not get too overrun with emotion and we'll give ourselves a chance to win this football game and become 2-0."

And jam.

Another crack at it

Minutemen look to avenge playoff loss against Colgate

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

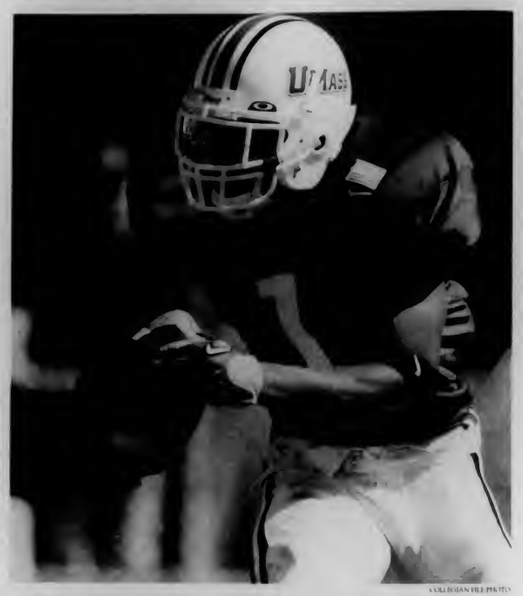
The smile on Jason Peebler's face disappeared instantaneously. What began as a light-hearted interview during the team's preseason media day had turned serious, because someone had said the word.

Not just any word, but THE word. A word so terrible that it forms a hole in the Massachusetts football team's collective stomach every time it's mentioned. A word so offensive that it pumps adrenaline through the Minutemen at the mere thought of what it entails. Two syllables that have boiled the blood of the defending Atlantic 10 champions for the past 10 months for reasons they will never forget.

Colgate.

"If you're a UMass football player and you're not ready to play Colgate, you need to have your head examined," the senior captain said. "You get shivers just thinking about it. That's what football is about, big games like that.

"After what happened last year at Colgate up in the snow, it couldn't set up our season any better. Delaware State and then come back here under the lights against Colgate.



"I get these every time I even think about playing them again." UMass' top wideout then added, pointing to the goosebumps that had formed on his left arm. "I just can't wait to get on the same field with them again."

Kickoff is slated for 6 p.m at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. Also, the university will honor members of the 1964 football team that played in the Tangerine Bowl prior to the game in addition to a fireworks display scheduled to follow the conclusion of the contest.

Having crushed Delaware State by a score of 51-0 to open their season, the Minutemen now indeed return home for the second night game in school history, and more importantly to face the team that knocked them out of the Division I-AA playoffs in 2003. UMass (1-0, 0-0 Atlantic 10) enters the game ranked No. 14 in the nation after vaulting five spots with the win over the Hornets.

Coach Dick Biddle's Red Raiders, meanwhile, will open their season on Saturday as the

A long-anticipated chance for revenge

Mike Marzelli

With just over an hour to go before the kickoff of their first round game in the 2003 Division I-AA football playoffs, the Colgate Red Raiders, undefeated champion of the Patriot League, were alone on their home field.

Why? Because the Massachusetts team bus very nearly plunged off the side of a mountain road while attempting to forge its way through the weather that prompted coach Mark Whipple to phone his wife and children and tell them to remain at the hotel, "rather than risking their lives" traveling to the game. By the time the Minutemen arrived, they barely had enough time to put on their uniforms, let alone prepare for the biggest game of the season.

Meanwhile, Andy Kerr Stadium — not to be confused with an actual stadium, but rather more like the school's back yard where they also happen to play football — was beyond repair. Frozen clods of mud and windwhipped heaps of snow replaced white-lined green grass. It was to the point that spotting the football became more of a wild guess then an exact science.

For a pair of teams coming off spectacular seasons, there could not have been a worse setting to play a make-or-break game.

By the time the Gate had escaped the first round with a 19-7 win over UMass, the joke had long since been on the Massachusetts football team. The 2003 Minutemen had gone 10-2

DOVER, Del. – Consider the Massachusetts football team's transition to 2004 complete.

With new coach Don Brown watching from the stands and a new quarterback under center, the Minutemen kicked off the 2004 season in fine fashion, dominating Delaware State 51-0 before 1,125 at Alumni Stadium on Sept. 4.

Brown, who was involved in a precarious legal situation following his departure from Northeastern, is not allowed to have any game-day contact with his players or staff for the first three games of the season, according to the settlement reached by the two schools.

"My staff did a great job as I was kind of left out of the loop today," Brown said. "I feel tremendous about the way our team responded. We're a family and we got through the first phase of this as a family."

UMass junior quarterback Tim Day, playing in his first game since 2002, set a new school record for efficiency by completing 17-of-19 passes (89.5 percent) for 290 yards and four touchdowns.

"Timmy really showed his ability to lead this team," Brown said. "He played within himself and made the throws he needed to make and just did an overall great job of managing the game and leading us to a win."

Wide receiver Jason Peebler also had a strong game for the Minutemen, catching five passes

UM drops pair on west coast

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team will return home from last week's turbulent stint on the West Coast to host Maine at 1 p.m. Saturday, in its home opener.

After defeating the University of Montreal by a score of 3-0 and resulting in a draw with Notre Dame (0-0) during preseason matches, UMass' record dropped to 0-2 after facing potent offenses at San Francisco's annual Diadora Classic.

While at the tournament, UMass suffered consecutive losses at the hands of fifth ranked Santa Clara and the hosting San Francisco Dons.

On the first day of competition, Santa Clara jumped out to an early 3-0 lead and managed to fend off 15 Massachusetts shots to preserve the shutout. Sophomore Nick Billman of UMass tallied seven saves on the day, but had no answer for a swarming Bronco offense, which scored all its goals less than 10 yards from the net.

Santa Clara got on the board just 2:59 into the game, when Peter Lowry scored, assisted by Medhi Ballouchy. Ballouchy went on to score a

Minutewomen struggling early

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is off to a slow start, but has begun to show some signs of improvement recently.

The Minutewomen stumbled out of the gate, dropping their first two contests at home to Boston University, 2-1, and Yale, 4-1. They also were defeated by a score of 2-1, in their lone road game against Fairfield.

The Stags took the lead early Sunday when the Minutewomen made the trek to Fairfield. Shannon Helm aided the opponent's cause, scoring on a rebound 11 minutes into the game. UMass goalie Kristin Walker made the initial save, but was unable to stop Helm's shot.

Fairfield's Meghan King managed to notch a second goal two minutes into the second half. King headed in a rebound of a shot that deflected off the cross bar.

UMass was only able to generate one goal, despite outshooting their opponents 12-7 and dominating the second half. This offensive attack was spearheaded once again by freshmen standout Britt Canfield. Canfield netted her second career goal at the 63:40 mark to bring UMass within a goal. Junior Lindsey Bellini set up the goal by sending the ball past the Fairfield defense. Canfield ran the ball down and pushed it past the goalie to the far post.

Field hockey falls to in-state rivals Harvard, Boston College

By Paula Aden
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team (0-3) came up short against a pair of in-state rivals this week, and as a result begins the 2004 season on a three-game losing streak.

The Minutewomen were the first on the scoreboard in both games, but failed to keep up as Boston College and Harvard were winners by scores of 3-1 and 4-1, respectively.

The Maroon and White first traveled to Waltham to play the Eagles. Senior Caitlin Beresin scored the first goal of the season for UMass with 23:52 left in the first half, assisted by sophomore Kwylan Jaggassar.

Less than two minutes later, Sara York answered with an unassisted goal to tie the game 1-1 with 22:07 left to play in the first half. Within the next seven minutes, the winning and insurance goals were scored for Boston College. Assisted by Tara Fernandes, Bronwen Kelly scored the game-winner exactly three minutes after York's tying

SPIRE woes continue; Registrar is unsure when service will be available for students

MATTHEW GUAY • COLLEGIAN

Students work in the basement W.E.B. DuBois Library yesterday. UMass students continued to have difficulty accessing the SPIRE system last night.

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Registrar Elizabeth Pyle says that officials are uncertain when SPIRE, the self-portal system that provides the University community with online access to grades, housing status, and class enrollment, will be in full working order.

"I think it's getting here, it's just been so frustrating for everyone in general," said Pyle. "I know patience is wearing thin."

"We've had people working around the clock," said Edward Blaguszewski, director of UMass news and information. "We are experiencing more serious problems than we anticipated."

The SPIRE system continued to provide "intermittent service" according to the Office of Information Technology Web site and the University's homepage.

ccording to Pyle, the SPIRE system was purposely closed yesterday to all students, providing access solely for faculty and administrators to make department transactions. This provided a low traffic audience to test several new adjustments that were made to the software over the course of the day. Student access was scheduled to resume by 7 p.m. last night until 8 a.m. this morning.

"We have to see how [the changes] work on a small volume of folks," said Pyle. "We're all curious to see how it goes."

Full student access should be available over the weekend, if the adjustments go smoothly. However, officials cannot pin point exactly why the upgraded SPIRE system has failed. Blaguszewski says that outside hacking or viruses are not to blame.

"Problems always occur when you are implementing major software. You never want or expect a problem of this magnitude to occur," he said.

Although the new system upgrade was implemented and sent through a battery of tests in early August, Blaguszewski says there are still issues that need to be resolved with the software.

"It's not like we plugged [SPIRE] in at the beginning of the week and hoped something happened," he said. "We have been working on it for quite a while."

OIT officials are working with Peoplesoft, the UMass information server system that SPIRE is a part of, to determine whether the crash was caused by a user overload due to the large numbers of people trying to access the system, a software glitch, or a combination of both. Officials are hoping to gain some answers by monitoring the system's reaction to lower amount of traffic until 7 p.m. today.

However, for many students, the SPIRE system is rendering their first week of classes almost useless. Pyle says that while the majority of students are registered for their core classes, a small percentage are not

Injured student upgraded

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

A 21-year-old female student was upgraded from critical to serious condition at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield after being struck by a motor vehicle on Commonwealth Avenue Wednsday night.

According to boyfriend Bill Webber, 35, junior Lisa Shiozaki was jogging in the "jogging lane" near Boyden Gym when a 1994 Red Mercury Sable traveling south struck her. University of Massachusetts Police Chief Patrick Archbald is unable to release the name of the driver without further investigation.

"This was not a hit-and-run accident," said Archbald. "The operator [of the vehicle] did remain on the scene and has been identified."

Webber said Shiozaki sustained severe injuries, including several fractures, two in the lower left leg, and one in the upper leg. She also suffered a fracture and abrasions to the face, and a crushed mouth with several missing teeth. Police are still investigating what speed the vehicle was traveling when it struck Shiozaki.

Archbald said that Shiozaki ran across Commonwealth Avenue and the car was unable to stop in time. Shiozaki was thrown onto the vehicle's hood and rolled up onto its windshield, according to Archbald.

UMPD received several cellular phone calls around 9:45 p.m., and responded within moments. Upon arrival, officers found Shiozaki conscious and able to speak. Amherst Fire Department to Baystate transported her, after officers realized that she was in critical condition.

According to Edward Blaguszewski, director of news and information at the UMass News Office, numerous students were leaving the Mullins Center after attending the Russell Simmons event and witnessed Shiozaki run from the east side of the street to the west side to join some friends near the playing fields by the Mullins Center, where she was then struck by the car. Blaguszewski said the UMPD investigation might take up to 72 hours to complete.

The accident is still under investigation by the UMPD who has plans to interview at least five witnesses.

"I can't report whether or not there will be any citations," said Archbald. "We are still gathering statements to hear [Shiozaki's] position."

In the hospital Shiozaki was reported to be in stable condition and resting at 5 p.m. last night. In a phone interview with the Daily Collegian, Webber said that his girlfriend says she does not remember much of the accident.

"[She remembers] she was jogging in the jogging lane and she was pretty far away from the road, five or six feet," said Webber. "She looked at her watch and the next thing she knew she was in the hospital."

Shiozaki is originally from Kawasaki, Japan, and resides on campus in the Lewis Dormitory of the Northeast Residential Area. Webber said that her mother still lives in Japan, and will be arriving to see her daughter on Friday night or Saturday. She has a brother who is a freshman at Colby Sawyer, and a sister who attends school in Montreal. Shiozaki is expected to be in the hospital from anywhere from two to six days.

However, Webber says Shiozaki, a linguistics major, is anxious to return to UMass.

"The bottom line is she feels frustrated, upset and depressed because she's really a stellar student," he said. "She was excited to start school and is worried about fulfilling her obligations."

9/11 survivor rocks the vote

S. Praimnath tours for Bush

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Correspondent

This is part of a series on 9/11.

"I don't feel fear anymore, there is no fear in my heart." After narrowly escaping from the eighty-first floor of the South Tower on September 11, 2001, Stanley Praimnath is grateful to be alive. "Each day I have is a blessing," he says.

Three years ago, Stanley watched in disbelief as United Airlines Flight 175 invaded his workplace, leaving the wing twenty feet from his desk. Tucked under his desk in the fetal position, Mr. Praimnath began to pray. Desperate and afraid he screamed out, "Lord send somebody, anybody."

He managed to crawl from his desk to a ten-foot high sheetrock wall, carefully avoiding a collapsed ceiling and dangling wiring. The jet fuel from the plane had made it hard to breathe and the visibility was poor. He reached the wall and was greeted by a voice. Brian Clark, who stood on the opposite side of the wall, instructed Praimnath to jump. Unable to successfully clear the wall, Stanley punched through the sheetrock and was pulled through the hole by Clark.

Both physically and mentally shaken, they descended arm in arm towards the exit. On their way to the ground level they encountered a man with a broken back and major head injuries. He was bleeding badly and screaming hysterically, "Please tell my wife and baby I love them." A security guard on the scene refused to leave the injured man. Both of these men perished. Excluding emergency personnel, Stanley Praimnath and Brian Clark were the last two people to safely leave the South Tower before it collapsing.

Stanley returned to work one month later at Mizuho Corporate Bank, where he is an Assistant Vice President in the loans department. Yet

Stanley Praimnath, a survivor of the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, is touring the country in support of President Bush's campaign.

Stanley says he will never be the same. "I experience a rollercoaster of emotions, emotional turmoil on a daily basis." Mr. Praimnath has recurring nightmares, as well as fits of claustrophobia and hyperventilation. He has received counseling, but found it to be ineffective.

Stanley says he receives therapy by traveling the nation and telling his tale of survival in churches, universities, and interviews. He says he uses these speeches and interviews as a tool to spread the word of God. "If you call on God with all your heart, mind, body, and soul; he will answer and intervene on your behalf," says Praimnath. Stanley has served as a Sunday School Superintendent and Men's Group Leader at the Assembly of God Church in Queens, New York.

At a time when the nation is divided on the president's tactics to thwart terrorism, Stanley says, "If the president did not do what he did, we would be in worse shape. I feel we're much safer as a people now." Current U.S. polls on homeland security do not unanimously support Stanley's claim. Praimnath wholehcartedly supports the military action in Afghanistan, but is somewhat skepticel about the Occupation of Iraq.

As the country prepares for the upcoming election, Praimnath feels "the war on terrorism should be the primary issue. "I will be voting for Bush, he brought closure to me," says Stanley. He contends that he does not belong to a particular political party, but says, "I'm for the man making the right decisions." Stanley does feel that John Kerry is a worthy candidate. Despite an enormous national debt, lack of job growth,

UMass professor Mednicoff cited for course in terrorism

By Jeremy Dirac

This is part of a series on 9/11.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — University of Massachusetts professor David M. Mednicoff received a national award Thursday for his course "Explaining terror" in which he teaches about the Sept. 11 tragedy.

Among those who chose to award the professor were family members of 9/11 victims. Mednicoff said that he developed his course because he saw that students were shaken by 9/11 and wanted to help them to understand why it happened.

Mednicoff said he believes that people ought to understand the importance of an informed citizenry.

"We are perceived by many people in the world, sometimes unfairly, and perhaps sometimes fairly, as being different than we think that we are," Mednicoff said. "We need to pay attention to what our government is doing here and abroad so we can avoid to some extent the horrible events that 9/11 draws home to us."

In his award winning course, offered last semester — and to be offered again this semester — Mednicoff wants students to explore different political explanations for 9/11 and to come to their own conclusions about why it happened.

"There's a lot of misinformation [about 9/11]," Mednicoff said.

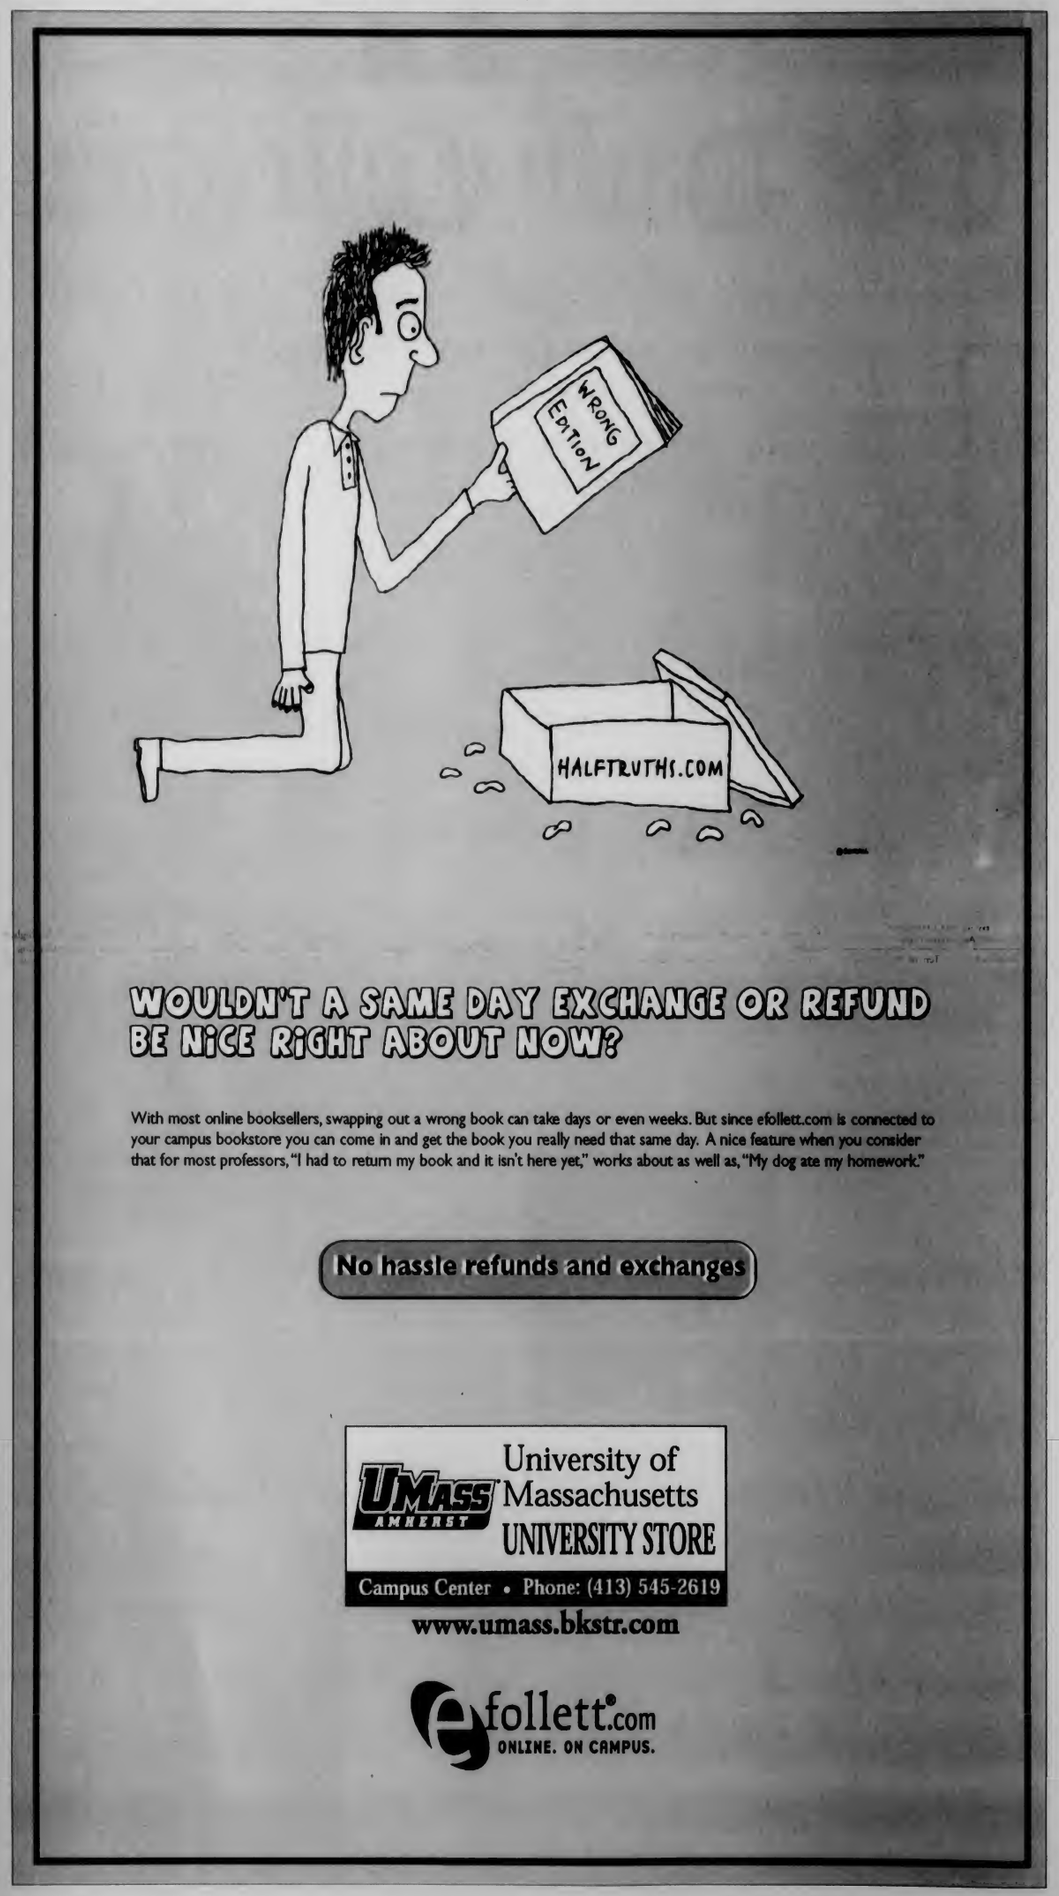
The award was given to Mednicoff by Dickinson College of Carlisle, Penn. and the Smithsonian National Museum of American History at the Smithsonian in Washington, D.C. The two institutions gave Best Practice awards to four teachers – elementary through college levels – on Thursday, Sept. 9 at the "Teaching 9/11: The Role of the Media, Museums, and Schools in Constructing National Memory" conference.

Before receiving their awards Mednicoff and the other award winners first participated in a panel discussion, "Teaching 9-11."

The moderator was Alison Zimbalist, senior producer for The New York Times Learning Network. Eugene W. Hickok, the Deputy Secretary of Education at the U.S. Department of Education, provided keynote comments.

Other award winners included Robert Peterson of La Escuela Fratney Elementary School, in Milwaukee, Wis., Tracy Paxton of Rivermont Collegiate Middle School, Bettendorf, Iowa and Masato Ogawa of Ontario High School, Ontario, Ore.

Mednicoff's response to the award included saying that he felt he was accepting the award on behalf of Middle Eastern professors more generally. He went on to say that the University has, "very good people teaching Middle Eastern history and politics," but said that one, "can never have too many people teaching ..." and regrets that the type of course he offers limits the number of students able to take his class.



Mednicoff is an assistant professor of Legal Studies and an adjunct assistant professor in the Department of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies. He is also involved with the UMass Program in Middle Eastern Studies. Mednicoff has a background in Middle Eastern politics, international and comparative law, human rights and globalization theory.

He attended Princeton and is currently finishing his PhD at Harvard. While his extensive travels have taken him to over forty countries, his extensive experience in the Middle East includes working as a lawyer in Egypt, and studying as a Fulbright scholar in Morocco. Other honors that Mednicoff has received include a Lilly Teaching Fellowship and The College of Social and Behavioral Science's 2004 Outstanding Teacher Award.

Ivan whacks Grenada

By Harold Quash
Associated Press

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada — Hurricane Ivan intensified Thursday, heading straight for Jamaica and possibly Florida with 160 mph winds after it killed at least 20 people while pummeling Grenada, Barbados and other islands. U.S. officials ordered people to evacuate the Florida Keys.

Foreigners began fleeing Jamaica, where officials urged a half million people to evacuate coastal and flood-prone areas.

Widespread looting erupted in St. George's, Grenada's capital, and dazed survivors picked through debris and tried to salvage remnants left by the storm. An Associated Press reporter watched people taking televisions and shopping carts of food from warehouses.

Troops from other Caribbean nations were on the way to help restore order in Grenada, where the country's police commissioner said every police station was damaged.

The most powerful hurricane to hit the Caribbean in 10 years damaged 90 percent of the homes in Grenada, killing 13 people there, and destroyed a 17th century stone prison that left criminals on the loose, officials said.

Ivan was expected to reach Jamaica by Friday and Cuba by the weekend, the U.S. National Hurricane Center in Miami said.

Tourists and residents also were told to evacuate the Florida Keys because Ivan could hit the island chain by Sunday. It was the third evacuation ordered there in a month, following Hurricane Charley and hard on the heels of Hurricane Frances.

Hurricane Ivan strengthened early Thursday to become a Category 5 on a scale of 5. It packed sustained winds of 160 mph with higher gusts as it passed north of the Dutch Caribbean islands of Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao.

Four children also drowned after they were swept into the sea from a beach in Santo Domingo, capital of the Dominican Republic, nearly

"The children were in front of the sea when it seems a gigantic wave dragged them into the Caribbean Sea," said Jose Luis German, a spokesman for the National Emergency Comm-ission. Authorities there closed part of the seaside Malecon drive, where massive waves washed over the road.

Jamaican leader P.J. Patterson urged his people to pray.

"We have to prepare for the worst case scenario. Let us pray for God's care," Patterson said Wednesday night. "This is a time that we must demonstrate that we are indeed our brothers' and sisters' keeper.". Ivan is the second major hurricane of the 2004 season.

U.S. airstrikes force seizure of Iraqi land

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — American warplanes struck militant positions in two insurgent-controlled cities Thursday and U.S. and Iraqi troops quietly took control of a third in a sweeping crackdown following a spike in attacks against U.S. forces.

More than 60 people were reported killed, most of them in Tal Afar, one of several cities, which American officials acknowledged this week had fallen under insurgent control and become "no-go" zones.

Nine people, including two children, were reported killed in an airstrike in Fallujah against a house, which the U.S. command suspected of being used by allies of the Jordanian-born terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The robust strikes came during a week in which nearly 20 American troops were killed, pushing the U.S. military death toll in the Iraq campaign above 1,000.

President Bush received a National Security Council briefing on Iraq early Thursday from Gen. John Abizaid, U.S. Ambassador to Iraq John Negroponte and other top officials. White House spokesman Scott McClellan refused to say what they told Bush of the surging violence.

In a statement, the U.S. command said military operations around Tal Afar were designed to rid the city of "a large terrorist element that has displaced local Iraqi security forces throughout the recent weeks."

The U.S. military said 57 insurgents were killed in the attack on Tal Afar, a northern city near the border with Syria that lies on smuggling routes for weapons and foreign fighters. The provincial health director, Dr. Rabie Yassin, said 27 civilians were killed and 70 wounded. It was unclear whether those reported by the Iraqis as civilians were counted as insurgents by the Americans.

Late Thursday, the regional government's television station reported U.S. and Iraqi government forces had agreed to allow medical teams to enter Tal Afar to care for the wounded but that military operations would continue "until the city is liberated from outsiders and saboteurs so that peace can be restored."

"Fighting went on throughout the night in three streets of Tal Afar between U.S. and Iraqi forces on the one hand and the resistance on the other," said Bushar Mohammed, a teacher who fled the city with his family.

Ten militants identified in Russia

Associated Press/ITAR-TASS, Presidential Photo Service

President Vladimir Putin and Minister Rashid Nurgaliyev meet in the Kremlin yesterday. Nurgaliyev also reported to Putin that directors had been appointed for anti-terrorist commissions in the North Caucasus region, which includes Chechnya.

By Maria Danilova
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Ten of the militants who seized a school in southern Russia have been identified and six were from Chechnya, security officials said Thursday, drawing a strong connection to the Chechen insurgents who have been fighting Russian forces for years.

None were Arabs, despite the government's contention that Arabs were involved in the hostage-taking last week in the North Ossetian town of Beslan, which ended in gunfire and explosions that killed more than 350 people, many of them children.

According to the officials, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity, the other four militants came from Ingushetia, which is sandwiched between North Ossetia and Chechnya and was targeted in brazen coordinated attacks against police that killed 90 people in June. The presence of Ingush raiders threatens to inflame long-standing tensions between Ingush and ethnic Ossetians, who are the majority in the republic.

President Vladimir Putin and Russian investigators have said about 10 of the roughly 30 attackers were Arabs, but authorities have not publicly provided evidence of the assertion. Officials who spoke Thursday made no mention of Arabs being among the militants.

Russian officials repeatedly have cast the military campaign in Chechnya as part of a war against international terrorism - a battle they say Western countries have hindered by granting asylum to Chechen figures and questioning Kremlin policy in Chechnya.

To push the point that Russia is a victim of international terror - and not just of violence spawned by the Chechen conflict, which critics say Kremlin policies have aggravated - Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov met with Rudolph Giuliani, mayor of New York City when al-Qaida suicide attackers struck the World Trade Center in 2001.

"When our Western partners urge us to rethink our policy and tactics in Chechnya, I would advise them not to interfere in Russian internal matters - which they do by granting asylum to terrorists who are directly to blame for the tragedy of the Chechen people," Lavrov said after the meeting.

He did not name specific countries, but Russia was particularly angered by Britain's granting of refugee status to Akhmed Zakayev, an envoy for Chechen rebel leader Aslan Maskhadov, and by U.S. asylum for Ilyas Akhmadov, who Maskhadov named his foreign minister while he was Chechnya's president in the late 1990s.

In comments published Thursday in the newspaper Vremya Novostei, Lavrov said: "Granting asylum to people involved in terrorism - and Russia has documented evidence of this - not only causes us regret but also effectively undermines the unity of the anti-terrorist coalition."

"We are far from accusing the leaders of major countries ... of deliberately preserving this double standard," he said. "But the inertia is still very strong."

Giuliani said that when Americans mourn the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks on the third anniversary Saturday, they will also think about victims of "this most current act of terrorism," referring to the school seizure.

"Even though these are things that you hope and pray don't happen and you realize that are very tragic, this will bring our people together, because we have been through something very similar," Giuliani said.

In Washington, Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge said President Bush has asked his top advisers to determine how authorities would handle a similar attack on an American school to ensure adequate coordination in the "unlikely but possible" chance of such an event in the United States.

Illegal drug use down; teens take prescriptions

By Siobhan McDonough
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Fewer American youths are using marijuana, LSD and Ecstasy, but more are abusing prescription drugs, the government reported Thursday.

The 2003 National Survey on Drug Use and Health also found that youths and young adults are more aware of the risks of using pot.

The study did find a 5 percent decline in the number of 12- to 17-year-olds who say they ever have used marijuana. Among 12- and 13-year olds, current marijuana smokers - those who said they used it within a month of the survey - declined nearly 30 percent.

"It is encouraging news that more American youths are getting the message that drugs are dangerous, including marijuana," Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson said.

The survey was based on in-home interviews with 67,784 respondents age 12 and older. The margin of error for the survey is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

For youths 12 to 17, use of Ecstasy and LSD in the year leading up to the survey dropped significantly - 41 percent for Ecstasy and 54 percent for LSD. The study, which also included adults, found that overall nearly 20 million people 12 and older use illegal drugs.

But there was a 20 percent decline between 2002 and 2003 in the number of youths described as "heavy users" of pot - meaning they smoke daily or at least 20 days each month.

Rates of tobacco use, however, remained fairly constant among all age groups. Almost 30 percent of people 12 and older reported that they had used it in the past month, compared with 30.4 percent in 2002.

People 18 to 25 continued to have the highest rate of current use of cigarettes - 40.2 percent, compared with 40.8 percent in 2002.

Among boys age 12 to 17, 11.9 percent reported current cigarette use, down from 12.3 percent in 2002. There was a bigger dip among girls in that age group. Some 12.5 percent reported they had smoked cigarettes in the past month, compared with 13.6 in 2003.

Survey results on alcohol use showed little change in the number of binge and heavy drinkers. About 54 million people 12 and older binged - five or more alcoholic drinks - at least once a month. Also, 16.1 million people were termed heavy drinkers, described as consuming five or more drinks on at least five separate occasions in a month.

People 18 to 25 showed the highest prevalence of binge and heavy drinking.

"Obviously, we have a long way to go when it comes to smoking and even more so when for underage drinking," said Charles G. Curie, administrator of the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. "It remains a stubborn and destructive problem."

The study also found that more people had tried prescription pain relievers who did not need them for medical reasons. The most striking increase was a 15 percent rise in prescription drug abuse by people 18 to 25. In the broader population of 12 and over, 5 percent more people took those drugs recreationally.

The study found that young people who were exposed to anti-drug messages outside school took notice, with rates of current pot use 25 percent lower than those who did not get those messages.

And youths who believed their parents would strongly disapprove of marijuana used it 80 percent less than others.

registered for any classes at all.

Despite the rumor that the Add/Drop period (the amount of time students have to add or drop classes on their schedules without penalty) would be extended, Pyle says that the deadline stands at Tuesday, September 21.

"We have a whole week and a half to figure out how quickly we can get back on [SPIRE]," she said. "Most students are just making small adjustments."

Students are still urged to attend the classes they wish to register for, even if they are not yet in the class. Updates on class times, locations, and availability are listed on the UMass Registrar's Web site under a downloadable PDF document labeled "Registration and Schedules".

Starting this morning, officials are planning to refresh information from SPIRE, such as class availability, every few hours so students do not attend classes that are already full.

"Anyone can use [the PDF document] throughout the day," said Pyle. "It's someplace to go that isn't SPIRE."

international hatred, and ongoing uncertainty in Iraq; recent polls show that the majority of Americans share Stanley's presidential preference. This lead by Bush was bolstered by last week's Republican National Convention. Experts expect this lead to dwindle in the coming weeks.

Mr. Praimnath has finished a book recalling his harrowing experience entitled, Plucked From the Fire. It is available at Rosedog bookstores and at Rosedog.com. Stanley says he forgives the individuals responsible for his pain, but he'll never forget them.

I would like to take this opportunity to be the first to thank this year's freshmen class for choosing this amazing institution to be the site for the advancement of their higher education. As a recent UMass graduate, I can wholeheartedly guarantee that four years from now you will emerge a drastically different human being, eight semesters older, eight semesters wiser and absolutely no closer to getting a decent job in the real world than you are today. When all is said and done, you will be $60,000 poorer and your liver will probably look a lot like Trachelle did after she flew head-first over the handle bars of that bike in "The Gauntlet" but hey, that's the price of an education these days.

What it comes down to is the fact that freshmen year is like going through puberty all over again. You'll be seeing hair in places you haven't seen hair before (feminists with unshaven armpits, guys experimenting with cheesy goatees, and the mashed potatoes at the dining hall). You'll be gaining a ton of weight in a very short period of time (Busch Light + D.P. Dough delivery – Varsity Field Hockey = Freshmen 15.) Then your hormones will be seeping into body parts you never knew existed. Anyway, to the Class of 2008, the following is your future, and there isn't a damn thing you can do about it:

You will go to class, take notes, and eat at the dining hall. You will fall asleep in class, borrow that cute brunette-whose-name-you-can-never-remember's notes, and get diarrhea from something you ate at the dining hall. You will be best friends with your roommate for the first month, get annoyed with her for playing that JoJo song 42 times a day, and eventually meet your real best friend and future roommate who lives down the hall. You will open up your refrigerator, hung over on a Sunday morning in hopes of stealing the last Poland Spring water bottle before your roommate wakes up. That water bottle will actually be filled with your roommate's leftover Poland Spring vodka, and he will wake up to you throwing up all over yourself.

Your cell phone will ring (the OC theme song) in the middle of CompSci 105 because your roommate feels the need to keep you updated every time he goes to the bathroom. You will have one poster that always falls down (never while you're in the room) no matter how much double-sided tape you apply. You will pass out with the official UMass recycling bin next to your bed, because, apparently, puke isn't being recycled enough these days. You will put up an away message that says something along the lines of "Naked and Wet" when you're in the shower, because apparently that's a clever way of saying it and has never been done before.

You will yell, 'I'm Rick James, bitch!' at a party and people will give you weird looks, partly because he's dead, but mostly because that was so last year.

You will get lost in the Morrill Science buildings. You will burn microwave popcorn at least 5 times, one of which will set off the fire alarm (and if you live on the 19th floor of John Quincy Adams... well, have fun with that). You will realize that the molasses/soy sauce crap they put on the sidewalks to melt snow on campus is absolutely useless after you fall on your ass in front of a large tour group. You will pay the $10 House Council Fee and not use the vacuum cleaner once.

You will yell, "I'm Rick James, bitch!" at a party and people will give you weird looks, partly because he's dead, but mostly because that was so last year. You will think about declaring your major roughly 87 times and end up not doing it at all because the walk is too far. Your forehead will get drawn on with permanent marker, most likely in the form of a penis or a funny word like Hoobastank. You will not notice this until your final look-in-the-mirror-before-class and you will be 10 minutes late because you couldn't wash the damn thing off. You will talk to your friends from home on AOL Instant Messenger roughly 41 seconds fewer every day than you did the day before. You will visit one of these friends at their respective schools and come home swearing, "she's changed" (translation: she has more friends at school than you do).

I guess I'll stop there and let you write the rest of your history yourselves, but I'll leave you with this: your high school career was dominated by what everyone else thought of you – their short-sighted preconceptions about your personality, your reputation, and your arbitrary position in the social food chain. Unfortunately, those preconceptions were usually misconceptions, and even more unfortunately, they just so happened to precede you at all times. As you walked through those familiar halls each day, you may have been seen as "the dork", or "the YGLM" (young girl with loose morals), or "the kid that crapped his pants in gym class that one time," and there was nothing you could do about it.

But the moment you arrived here and unpacked your parents' SUV, you left those things behind. The Etch-a-Sketch has officially been shaken, and each new person that enters your life gives you a chance to turn the knobs and reveal a new ragged mess of bent-ass lines representing the person you see in the mirror every morning. So if I could offer you one piece of advice, it would have to be this: the left knob is for horizontal, the right is for vertical, and no matter what, do not attempt this during bumpy car-rides.

Welcome to the best four years of your lives, kids. Now don't f this up.

Neighboring schools seem miles apart

Ben Feder

Amherst College has always been down the street from the University of Massachusetts. To get from one school to the other it's about a 10-minute walk or five-minute bus ride. Along with many of my fellow students, I've never really paid attention to our neighboring campus and I'm sure the same is true for their students when thinking of UMass. With these schools in such close proximity though, why isn't there a close relationship or maybe even a healthy rivalry?

The overlying truth, which I discovered, is that students don't really understand why there isn't any interaction between the schools, but they certainly recognize that the distance is there. When asking students why there is distance, I received a variety of answers all pointing to a big, overlying "I don't know." A senior UMass communication disorders major, said, "I think the fact that I don't have a single friend at Amherst and the college is like 5-minutes away sort of says something."

Junior Megan Bannon believes that, "UMass students never need to go to anything on (Amherst's) campus because UMass provides enough entertainment."

When I brought this question to Amherst College, I got similar responses. Three Amherst College students, wishing to remain anonymous, said that they rarely think about UMass and find that students from both schools don't really care. "Most people do not really think about things outside their immediate personal world," said one student.

Another replied, "It's really weird that the two schools are so close yet they both ignore the other's existence."

I feel the reason why this lack of connection occurs is because the students feel that their school and the type of students there are radically different. UMass, a public institution, has a large student body of about 24,000, while the private Amherst College has approximately 1,500 students. "UMass is a lot larger than Amherst and we don't have much in common," said a senior UMass student.

UMass definitely offers a wider range of programs when compared to Amherst College but UMass' research facilities and larger course offerings bring Amherst students to UMass every semester. Still there is little intimacy between the student bodies.

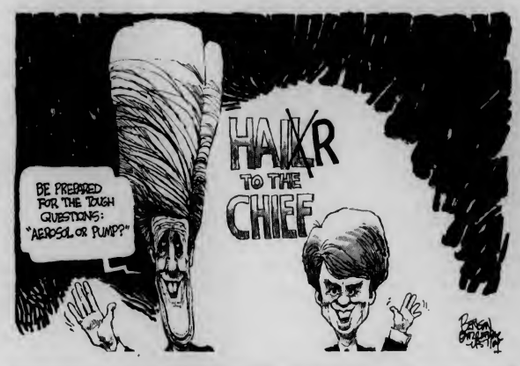
There is a chance for interaction though since this area we live in is entirely unique. The Princeton Review advertises that one of the advantages of the schools in the Five-College area is opportunities provided by the consortium. Academics aside, students can mingle, play, and get involved with these other campuses on many levels besides using their libraries. Plainly put: in a 15-mile radius there are 35,000, 18 to 22-year-olds running around. You'd think common ground, or at least hormonal ground, would be found somewhere.

Stereotyping is driving a rift between the two schools. I spent my earlier years believing Amherst College students were all boring, studious, rich kids with a stuck up intent on being antisocial. It was not until I attended an event at Amherst and met some great people whom, to my surprise, were much like average B-students such as myself. When presenting the stereotype idea to individuals their responses were as cliche as mine.

Stereotyping is driving a rift between the two schools. I spent my earlier years believing Amherst College students were all boring, studious, rich kids with a stuck up intent on being antisocial.

Jonathan Korhonen, a senior at UMass said, "Amherst College is much smaller, you have to be smart, and have to have dough to go there, thus, there is a smaller percentage of hooligans." Whereas for UMass, he adds, "there is more diversity here since we get students from both sides of the spectrum."

Amherst sophomore Ryan Simpson said, "I think there's a looming stereotype that is rumored to be true," says Simpson. "For all those who haven't set foot onto Amherst College, it is assumed that we are all stuck up smart kids who don't know how to have a good time."



When outside the campuses though, are these distinctions as evident? "When I'm downtown or something, I don't look at students and say, 'they go to UMass, they go to Amherst,'" said a UMass student. "I think they drive nicer cars and can afford higher tuition, but I don't know how that really affects their personalities, if at all."

Does the nightlife affect social interaction then? "You won't hear of someone who doesn't go to a UMass party because they think it will be lame. Instead, our reputation attracts people," Korhonen said, adding, "whereas for Amherst College, I don't think the same applies." However, UMass Senior Curtis Killian says, "Amherst College parties are crazy; the classic 'whole dorm partying in the halls' type thing."

So, it couldn't be the party atmosphere that separates the schools. As evidenced by these statements the stereotypes currently in circulation about the two institutions are completely unfounded. Gather any group of college kids on a Saturday night and class barriers will break down in the interest of having a good time.

Overall my investigation only leads to more questions. I find it hard to believe that these two schools are completely incompatible and that the students can't interact with each other. Maybe due to lack of communication or sheer laziness, students find indifference is the easiest solution. But to those reading this, since a new school year is beginning, go visit the other schools and see what awaits you there. You might be surprise in what you'll find.

PART OF THE PROBLEM OR THE SOLUTION?

I have always felt that I should treat every woman as the princess they are. Every woman out their is someone's loved one (mother, sister, partner, daughter, friend) and should be interacted with accordingly. I know that the ones in my life deserve to be respected and appreciated, not victimized and demoralized, and it should be everybody's maxim to continue these thoughts.

I am an educator/advocate and volunteer at the Everywoman's Center and I strongly believe that women's violence and victimization is a problem that men must make a stand against. So guys, please show respect and honor to any woman you meet here, or anywhere else, by asking for consent and not forcing anything that she does not want to do.

SOGGY WEATHER

Another wet dey has come and gone at the University of Massechusetts. The irregular spurts of rain only contributed to the hectic first days of class. Many freshmen, me included, were unprepared for the wet weather without an umbrella. The frantic dashing to classes, left students only hoping that the fifteen-minute window to get to class fell between the periodic downpours. The rain also caused many freshmen to become more wet than necessary, while stopping at the Locator Service to figure out the direction of their next class or making an extra stop at Whitmore to find out which classes they had, due to SPIRE being unavellable.

The rain is not only making it an obstacle to attend class, but also hindering the excitement of meeting new people and exploring our new home. There ere no people playing Frisbee in the queds, and the freshmen welcome party in Southwest was even canceled last night. The idea of walking into town is nixed, avoiding puddies and deshing from store to store takes the fun out of that idea. As for walking to the textbook annex: are buying books really worth another wet change of clothes? Even a soggy trek across campus to chill with a friend in another dorm holds little appeal, the uncomfortable wet clothes upon arrival definitely takes away from the enjoyment of hanging out. Then you heve to deal with knowing you will just have to venture outside and get wet again.

With the weather and computer complications making the first days of class difficult and unappealing to attend, as well as hindering the ability to readily make new friends or participate in outdoor welcoming activities. I must admit I am still enjoying the start of my new life at UMass. That being said, I now heartily welcome the dry forecast of tomorrow.

Phantom Planet survives without Schwartzman

By David Pessah
Collegian Staff

The full spectrum of the Phantom Planet's lifespan was on display at the Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton on Wednesday as they delivered an energy filled show of songs spanning their entire career.

Talk about Phantom Planet with most people and they will exclaim, "Yeah, I like that song California." When the band agreed to lend their ode to the west coast to the Fox television show "The O.C.," it became the one thing they were best known for. This may be a blessing for a band that lost their star staple when "Rushmore" actor Jason Schwartzman left the band before they recorded their self-titled new album, but listeners would surely miss out if they let that song be their only Phantom Planet experience.

The show took place in the Pearl Street basement, providing the underground music scene ambiance that indie rock is best played in. Though the attendance seemed slightly lacking – apparently the O.C. is not big in Northampton – the band didn't seem to care and even looked as if they were having a great time playing to the intimate crowd.

Alex Greenwald, the bands lead singer / guitarist entered first, standing alone on stage softly beginning the set with "By the Bed" from their recent release. This was before the rest of the band came on stage to bring the song to a full crescendo. Eve starts off a new year with a change of heart

Original Sin
Eve

Why do the guys in my life always seem to call when it's too late? Do they have an intuitive alarm system that sets off on the day I really and truly forget about them? There might have been only one guy left in the back of my mind that I had secretly been waiting to hear from. The day that I did hear from him, everything changed.

One day the phone rings and my heart stops. It was him, the one and only ex that I had fallen hopelessly in love with, the one and only guy who destroyed my heart, my trust and my overall happiness, and the one and only guy I had yet to get over. So naturally, I cleared my throat and answered. "Hello," I say casually. "Hey, how are you?" I deliberately pause for a moment before answering, "Um, hi. Who is this?" I smile to myself, knowing that must have hurt, but it has been a year since we broke up and since I'd heard from him so why would I still recognize his voice? "It's me, silly. I was just calling to see if you wanted to meet up. I've been thinking about you a lot lately and I thought we could have a cup of coffee together sometime. Is a half an hour enough time?" I looked at the clock and then at my outfit. My heart was racing and my body shaking. There would be absolutely no time to look perfect for our first casual coffee after a year of a not so casual break-up. But oh yeah, I hate him, remember? "Sure. That sounds great," I said. "I'll meet you there in 45 minutes."

Why did I agree to see him? I don't know. But as I drove toward him it became clear. This will be my closure, maybe even our closure, although I didn't really care about his feelings on the matter. I needed to be entirely selfish. I had questions and he would be the only one to answer them. As I pulled into our use-to-be coffee place, I quickly checked myself in the rear view and adjusted my top. My hands were cold and wet and I could barely stomach the idea of seeing him.

As I stepped out of my car, there he stood, smiling bravely and embracing me even more bravely. I had an overwhelming urge to shake his phony, arrogant smile right off of his not-so-amazing-anymore face. But I looked over his shoulder instead and said, "Well I see your nose hasn't gotten any smaller." Rolling my eyes, I retracted, "well, it's great to see you too." I flash him an obnoxious smile and can't help but blush. "Come, let's take a walk." I nod and follow him. Every two steps that I took, I repeated my well-practiced mantra: 'He's a manipulator, a liar, a cheater. Never go back. Never go back.'

It worked. I once again felt the anger rise throughout my body and all of the unanswered questions took alphabetical formation. I sat down on a nearby bench and turned to him. "Sit down. I need to talk and you need to listen." He looked annoyed but I didn't care. So I began and I didn't stop for an hour. Even though the conversation was saturated with pain, anger and lots of whys, he listened and responded, and I got my answers.

He opened his arms gave me a long, heart-felt, emotional, i-miss-your-feel hug. He wouldn't let me go. After a minute he still wouldn't let me go. I struggled uncomfortably and said, "Okay, um, I have to go now."

He walked me to my car and the following week he invited me out for a drink. I said that I was busy and I think he got the point. Something within me had changed after our conversation. I gained a feeling of freedom, a repaired heart. It was one of the most incredible feelings I had only dreamt about in the past. He sighed as if he felt something. "Sorry," he said. Thankfully, I felt nothing. Not even the smallest tinge of emotion. I then looked at him and wondered why I had ever fallen for him to begin with. I was over it. "It was nice to see you. Good luck in what you do," and I walked away, loving every moment of my new realization.

jumped around and ripped through impressive instrumentals. Farrar even decided to jump on top of a large speaker mid set. As he ducked his head to avoid hitting it on the basement ceiling, he performed what was the most impressive bass instrumental I have ever seen.

The show belonged to Greenwald though. He sang into the microphone with an extreme passion for each lyric in an almost erotic style, as someone had mentioned. Whether he was slowing it down for moments like an acoustic/electric version of "The Anthem" or playing his guitar while lying on his back on the floor, or even furiously banging on the drums himself as the new single "Big Brat" closed the set, he proved he could hold the audience's attention with more than just his singing.

The band played most of the songs from "Phantom Planet" in their two-hour long set as well as some unreleased songs and very early material. The crowd sang along with almost every word.

"You are the first crowd that knew the words to that song," Greenwald exclaimed after the band played one of its early songs. He was clearly impressed by the bands knowledge of their material.

Covering material from their previous album, "The Guest," Greenwald played the excellent "Lonely Day" before he stopped the set to explain to the crowd that they were about to play an old concert staple. Before they could start though, the crowd was told to ask him how he was doing. After the necessary count to three, the crowd screamed the question and Greenwald answered the call with, "everything is OK. Everything is Fine," from the song "Nobody's Fault."

Throughout the show Phantom Planet acted as if they were a bunch of high school kids playing a show to friends in their parent's basement and they seemed to love every minute of it. This helped to prove that the band could be successful without Jason Schwartzman. Their stage presence connected with the crowd for an extremely enjoyable experience with the non-jaded musicians.

And yes, Phantom Planet played "California," and it rocked.

John Vanderslice makes a name for himself with 'Cellar Door'

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Just about every self-proclaimed indie-rock loving kid has heard John Vanderslice – they just don't know it. Aside from being a musician in his own right, Vanderslice owns and operates his own recording studio, Tiny Telephone, and has produced, mixed, and collaborated with acts from Beulah to The Mountain Goats and Death Cab For Cutie. Now, as his peers are growing bigger and bigger, Vanderslice has released his fourth and best album.

John Vanderslice
'Cellar Door'
Barsuk Records

"Cellar Door" is a collection of organic, lo-fi pop songs with a post-millennium electronic edge. The guitars and melodies are mixed alongside keyboards and drum loops to create a full, wholly original sound. But make no mistake; Vanderslice is no electronic artist.

"I'm definitely more analog," Vanderslice remarked with no hesitation during an interview with the Collegian conducted during his tour stop in Boston, "I love computers and I love what computers have brought to musicians, but I like recording on tape better. It's linear. It's fixed. It's so archaic there's something beautiful about it. I think people have too many options and ... the less options the better. It's easier to be more focused creatively if you have less options."

Limiting options has certainly worked in Vanderslice's favor as over the course of his solo career (he started off in a self-proclaimed "obscure" rock band called MK Ultra) his albums have gotten progressively stronger and stronger. On "Cellar Door" Vanderslice achieves a type of musical and creative balance that few artists ever can. He seems very assured in what he is doing, but he doesn't rely on formula. All the songs come together to form a cohesive album but nothing blends together in a generic wash.

Vanderslice's lyrics are also stronger then ever. He has proven that he can be both a master storyteller and also capable of revealing and autobiographical songs. While Vanderslice is very open with the fact that films influence many of his songs, (the album's name is taken from "Donnie Darko") it is often hard to tell which songs are real and which are fiction.

"The songs are probably my most autobiographical but I try to mix it up because I don't want my family or my friends to know specifically what I'm talking about so I try to muck it up. I don't want to be too honest because that's harsh," Vanderslice laughed.

Some songs on the album are even more openly fictional. "Promising Actress" takes its plot and chorus from David Lynch's "Mulholland Drive." "When It Hits My Blood" is a first-person tale of drug addiction, told by the main character from "Requiem For A Dream."

"There is some reality in every song. Every song has like 20% reality, 20% fiction, and a bunch of bullshit," said Vanderslice.

Vanderslice's mixture of truth and invention works perfectly. Every song has a raw emotional core and the listener has no choice but to feel for the narrator. "Up Above The Sea" is a story of a scared man who tempts fate and questions a visiting bird. "They Won't Let Me Run," a song Vanderslice says is inspired by '50s movies, is a compelling account of a small town couple who only want to

As if the beginning of the semester isn't stressful enough, we then come to the age old question that has plagued mankind for decades: "what's new on TV?" It's quite an appropriate question when you think of all of the time the average American spends with their beloved tube.

The scope of primetime Television has been quite formulated for the past few years, consisting of the reality TV phenomenon, the blue collar drama and the show that appeals to the twenty-somethings. This season doesn't seem to look much different, but the only difference is that our TV's saving grace, Carrie and the "Sex and the City" gang are no longer there to look to for solace.

Yes, it's true. After six years our Sunday nights will never be the same. There will be no witty banter from Miranda, no sexcapades from Samantha, no hopeless romanticism from Charlotte, and no soul searching from our favorite heroine Carrie. We knew it was coming, we thought we prepared ourselves for it and although we have TBS and DVD boxed sets to keep memories alive, the fact remains the same: their will forever be an absence in our Sunday nights. So what are we to do in this time of TV reformation? What any great survivor would, adapt and find alternatives for our "Sex fix" and hope for the best.

And maybe it's doable. Although we know nothing can ever come close, we sure can try to patch the hole in our hearts. Instead of "Sex" on Sunday nights, we now have more time for the likes of our favorite yellow family, the Simpsons, now in their 14th season. "The Simpsons" is the longest running sitcom on TV and for good reason. Rediscover this legendary TV show with its new season starting in September on Fox at 8 p.m.

When speaking of dearly departed TV shows, Friends is privy to an honorable mention. Although the characters are now off on their individual journeys, at least one friend is still in the spotlight: "Joey," the new NBC sitcom is a spin-off from "Friends." It follows Matt LeBlanc's lovable character Joey to the sunny shores of Los Angeles as he continues to pursue his acting career. Joey will fill in the friends Thursday night spot at 8 p.m. on NBC, followed by our favorite modern-day odd couple "Will & Grace" which remains in its 8:30 p.m. spot.

What would a rundown of a TV lineup be without the mention of reality TV? This fall, supermodel Tyra Banks is back with her third season of "America's Next Top Model," the reality TV show that scours the country looking for the next big face in the modeling world. Catch "Top Model" on the UPN, Wednesday nights at 8 p.m.

Also in the realm of reality TV is the return of "The Apprentice." "The Apprentice 2" will feature more cutthroat execs, more tasks, more firing and more drama. "The Apprentice 2" will air Thursday nights on NBC following "Will & Grace" and "Joey."

escape their families.

"Heated Pool And Bar" finds the narrator and his family members as various morally ambiguous military characters. The verse about a guard who tortures prisoners of war is, in light of recent events, even more shocking and thought provoking.

Despite the darker emotions and themes that permeate the album, "Cellar Door" is not an overbearing affair. "Coming And Going On Easy Terms," one of the album's very best tracks is groove-laden and airy, despite the fact that the lyrics are about a father being told that his son might be dead. The chorus screams of fear and despair yet is as catchy as any happy-go-lucky love song.

Perhaps it is the fact that Vanderslice avoids clichés and presents the unexpected that makes "Cellar Door" so great. It is sad, yet bouncy, stripped down, yet intensely layered. The songs all hit you immediately but still reveal themselves upon further listens. Vanderslice throws trademark sounds and sonic ideas throughout the album – including his own unmistakable voice and delivery – while pushing himself further then ever before.

Though his previous efforts are nothing to scoff at, "Cellar Door" is far superior to anything Vanderslice has ever done before. If this is what Vanderslice keeps in his "Cellar Door," then the living room must have some truly remarkable stuff.

Pats take top spot in our season preview

(9) Jacksonville Jaguars* (10-6): This is another team that will shock some people this year. They have a very blue-collar defense that will knock some finesse teams around such as…

(11) Indianapolis Colts (9-7): The Patriots exploited the Colts last year the same way they did it to the Rams in the Super Bowl. The demise of the Colts begins now.

(22) Houston Texans (6-10): This team has the talent to win nine games in most divisions, but they are stuck in the AFC South, the most difficult place to play in football. This is a playoff team next year and a championship contender in two years.

AFC West

(7) Kansas City Chiefs (12-4): Same team as last year. Good. Defense can't be any worse than last year. Good. Stuck in a terrible division. Good. They still have no shot at the Super Bowl. Bad.

(18) Oakland Raiders (9-7): Their defensive line with Warren Sapp, Bobby Hamilton and Ted Washington will carry this confused defense. They still aren't as good as their record because of the lame division they are in.

(19) Denver Broncos (8-8): I understand that defense wins championships, but how many championships did Champ Bailey win in Washington. Clinton Portis will be one of the best five running backs in the NFL for the next six seasons. Send Mike Shanahan to Donald Trump's office. He's fired.

(31) San Diego Chargers (4-12): I hate to see such a great talent in LT go to waste. He will be responsible for all four wins. If he goes down early, this team may not win a single game this year.

NFC East

(6) Philadelphia Eagles (10-6): Terrell Owens is the Alex Rodriguez of football. He is one of the most talented guys in the league, but he is too much of a distraction and constantly makes the people around him underachieve.

(17) Dallas Cowboys (9-7): Somehow, someway, this team will win nine games. Even with Vinny Testaverde running the show.

(21) Washington Redskins (7-9): How many years in a row have we heard that the Redskins will have a great year? How many years has Dan Snyder owned the Redskins? Here's a hint: it's the same answer for both questions. Talented individuals don't win games in the NFL anymore. Good teams do. Good luck in 2007 when you have $30 million against the cap in penalties alone. This will be a team of replacements once again.

(28) New York Giants (5-11): They were terrible last year, and they haven't upgraded at a single position this year. I hope Eli and his family are happy in a New York City basement.

NFC North

(8) Minnesota Vikings (10-6): Will this be the year the Vikings put two solid halves together? No, but I don't see a 6-2 followed by a 4-4, either. Mediocrity all around in a poor division. By the way, Mike Tice is still the most brain dead coach in the league.

(13) Green Bay Packers* (10-6): I hate to see it happen, but Brett Faav-rah has seen his last good days in a uniform.

(25) Detroit Lions (6-10): They improved themselves dramatically through the draft, but can this young group of talent be able to win any games without a proven leader?

(26) Chicago Bears (5-11): Rex Grossman isn't the answer here; neither is Lovie Smith.

NFC South

(4) Carolina Panthers (11-5): They have a swagger about them that has lasted since the Super Bowl. The undefeated preseason showed just how serious the Panthers are about staying away from VH1's next one-hit-wonder countdown.

(12) Atlanta Falcons (9-7): "Can Mike Vick stay healthy?" is the biggest question in sports right now. If he does, the Falcons are an obvious playoff contender. You didn't need me to tell you that. By the way, congratulations to Marcus Vick on your suspension from Virginia Tech. Mike is now one more injury away from making brothers Vick the most disappointing duo in sports history.

(14) New Orleans Saints (9-7): Another season. Another set of high expectations. Jim Haslett's coaching job may not last the season if New Orleans regains its "Aints" form from years past.

(24) Tampa Bay Buccaneers (6-10): The bigger they are, the harder they fall. Warren Sapp was a mighty big man.

NFC West

(2) Seattle Seahawks (12-4): They aren't going to surprise anyone with a quick start this year. They are just going to flat out pummel teams.

(10) St. Louis Rams* (10-6): Kurt Warner definitely wasn't the answer for this team (or any team for that matter), but Marc Bulger is as careless with the football as Martha Stewart was with her stock tips.

(29) Arizona Cardinals (4-12): They'll win four games. Most teams do.

(32) San Francisco 49ers (2-14): Joe Montana couldn't solve the problems within this organization. What is my solution, you ask? Make the 49ers play the Chargers. The loser of the game is banned from football completely. The winner has a permanent spot in NFL Europe.

On anniversary, sports are our best way to remember possibly forget about 9/11 needs to do some serious soul-searching, for their own humanity. But to steal an unfortunate battle cry from the Bush Administration post-9/11, if we don't get on with being Americans, with being people again, then we truly do "let the terrorists win." We would be giving terrorists everywhere the satisfaction of knowing that the greatest country in the world could be brought down by their acts, turned into a place of anxiety, tension, and hostility.

And so, we come to the third anniversary. Saturday is the beginning of the next chapter of post-9/11 American life. There are remembrances scheduled to take place everywhere. Vigils, religious services, and other forms of public grieving will mark the day, as they should.

However, in the spirit of regaining the America that was lost on that day, we can also turn to celebratory events to further our rehabilitation. To suggest that a sporting event will heal all wounds would be shortsighted, but even on this campus, there are a number of opportunities to congregate with other people, to be joyful, to celebrate our own existence and the unique aspect of human spirit that athletes bring to the playing field.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team plays at 1 p.m., and the football team plays under the lights at 6 p.m. The games are not going to be played in spite of the context of the day. Rather, they should be a part of it.

Few things capture the ideals of America as well as sports. Competition, hard work, and camaraderie are lessons we learn by playing games together, and they are qualities that often go hand-in-hand with the American Dream. So it is not rude or uncaring of us to attend and enjoy sports tomorrow. In fact, it is a perfect response to the acts of 9/11. Large, happy crowds of people, cheering on the home team (or the visitors, should you be visiting from Maine or Hamilton, N.Y.) are a perfect image of the good things about sport, and the good things about America.

We will never forget what happened three years ago. But perhaps, by spending tomorrow in the stands and on the field, we will be able to commemorate the day of tragedy and heroism, of sadness and courage, with the one thing that we've proven will never be brought down by terrorist acts: the American spirit.

Federer soaks Agassi

On his way to 3rd major final

By Howard Fendrich
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Andre Agassi sat alone, staring blankly at an Arthur Ashe Stadium doorway, the silence punctured by the rustling leaves on nearby trees.

Soon, he'd walk through that exit, his U.S. Open done with a 6-3, 2-6, 7-5, 3-6, 6-3 loss Thursday to top-ranked Roger Federer in a quarterfinal, suspended by rain early in the fourth set the night before and wrapped up in the worst of swirling winds.

In those idle moments on a lobby bench, there was plenty for the 34-year-old Agassi to contemplate. The immediate past: How did that match slip away? And the future: How much longer do I want to put in the work it takes to compete?

"My game plan is to play until I can't do it," Agassi said. "I certainly want to be able to assess my level of play, and at some point my level of play will dictate my decisions. But as of right now, I'm trying to win tournaments, and I believe that with that focus, I can still do that."

The eight-time major champion certainly gave Federer all he could handle, stretching a man 11 years his junior to the limit. It wasn't gorgeous tennis, but it couldn't possibly be with gusts approaching 40 mph.

Picked up by the chair umpire's microphone, the wind provided a thunderous bass-line to a soundtrack that included the ruffling of shirts and empty cups clattering in the stands. Towels flew off changeover chairs, and a let was called when a silver hot dog wrapper slid by Federer's feet during a rally.

With a point here and there making the difference, Federer was superb, breaking Agassi in the next-to-last game and displaying the win-the-big-ones instinct he's developed. The Wimbledon and Australian Open champion has won 10 straight tournament finals; he's 15-0 against top 10 players since November.

Federer's first U.S. Open semifinal will be against another player never this far at Flushing Meadows: No. 5 Tim Henman, who beat No. 22 Dominik Hrbaty 6-1, 7-5, 5-7, 6-2. On the other side of the draw, 2001 Open champion Lleyton Hewitt overwhelmed Tommy Haas 6-2, 6-2, 6-2 to set up a semifinal against defending champ Andy Roddick or No. 28 Joachim Johansson, who played at night.

Hewitt was remarkably efficient, making 10 unforced errors, but Haas might have come up with the shot of the tournament. At 5-1 in the third set, Haas sprinted from the net to the baseline and, his back to the court, smacked a shot between his legs that zoomed over the net. When Hewitt volleyed, Haas deposited a passing shot, then reared back on his heels, raised his arms, looked to the sky and swung an uppercut, celebrating as if he won the match.

One game later, though, Hewitt did win, making the Open's semifinals for the fourth time in five years. He hardly seemed harassed by the wind.

"You had to be patient and mentally tough out there and not let it bother you," Hewitt said. "I didn't really let it worry me at all."

Agassi was trying to become the oldest Open champion since 1970. Instead, Federer moves on in pursuit of his third Grand Slam title of the season, something done just twice in the last 30 years: by Mats Wilander in 1988, and Jimmy Connors in 1974.

"He's a little bit older than me, but he's not 50 or 60," Federer said with a smile. "He can still run and play, he can win tournaments, and he can beat the best."

Agassi was shocked in the first round at the French Open, and he pulled out of Wimbledon with a bum hip. But he played well in U.S. Open tuneups, beating Roddick and Hewitt en route to the Cincinnati Masters title.

Bad luck won't bring them down players. From then on, things were never the same in the 2003 season.

If the Minutewomen are going to make a statement, it will have to be through contain-ing Best and junior Jackie Wishoski, two of UNH's most skilled players.

The overly aggressive Wishoski (three goals, six points) has been the team's leading goal-scorer since she came into the program in 2002. Last season saw the forward from Malden, Mass. put herself in UNH's record books, setting new single-season all-time highs in goals (18) and points (41).

The former America East All-Rookie also set an America East tournament single-game record when she racked up five goals and one assist for 11 points in the first round against Northeastern, as well as the record for most tournament goals (six).

"She's everywhere, all the time," Rudy said. "She is a real package to handle."

Bonds wary of comparisons to greats

By Joe Roderick
Knight Ridder Newspapers

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. — Barry Bonds seems truly uncomfortable when placed among the pantheon of greats in his profession.

Last week while in Atlanta, Bonds was informed that Hank Aaron had told reporters several hours earlier that he thought Bonds was, "one of the greatest hitters that ever played the game."

"I don't know about that," Bonds said almost sheepishly, as if he was being transformed to the skinny left fielder that broke into the major leagues in 1986.

Two home runs shy of joining the 700 club—with only two members: Aaron and Babe Ruth—Bonds recently gave a rare glimpse of his inner thoughts as he neared another milestone.

"I'm amazed by all of this right now," he said. "I'm amazed by it all."

Comparisons between Bonds and Aaron, and Bonds and Ruth, pop up daily on Internet sites and appear regularly in newspapers throughout the country. Those comparisons, however, seem meaningless when Aaron, the all-time home run king with 755, said there is no comparison.

"No question about it. You have to put it in context, that he's probably one of the greatest hitters that ever played the game," Aaron said. "I've heard some people say (it was) Ted Williams, and Ted was great. Of course, Ted was the last player to hit .400. But who knows? If they pitched to Barry, he might hit .450.

"I'm sure it's going to be argued and debated among sportswriters and others, people would say Babe Ruth was the greatest, and I wish them all the luck in the world, but you have put Barry a little past Babe Ruth."

And even Aaron?

"Oh yeah," he replied. "He'd have to be the greatest hitter I've seen or heard of."

Harmon Killebrew, seventh on the homer list with 573, did not disagree with Aaron.

"With all the records he's approaching, you've got to say that. He's a great player," Killebrew said. "Not too many people thought 700 homers was a mark many people would get to. He's done it in quick fashion."

Said Andre Dawson, a former MVP who finished with 438 homers, "You've got to consider him the greatest of all time because of what he's been able to do in the latter part of his career, not the early part. That's phenomenal in itself and worthy of consideration, because players usually do it early and tail off at the end. It's been the other way around with him."

Former teammate Matt Williams said, "We all wish we had that kind of talent."

While Aaron seemed genuine in ranking Bonds a little ahead of himself and Ruth as a hitter, statistics tell a slightly different story.

Although Bonds has played 4 fewer seasons than Aaron, he also has 1,059 fewer hits. With 1,833 RBI, Bonds trails Aaron by 464 and Ruth by 380. Bonds has played 3 fewer seasons than Ruth.

Bonds, whose .300 lifetime batting average trails Ruth (a .342 career hitter) by 42 points and Aaron (.305) by five, leads Aaron in on-base (.441-.374) and slugging (.610-.555) percentages. But Ruth compiled .474 and .690 marks, respectively, clearly superior to Bonds.

Bonds wishes the comparisons between himself, Aaron and Ruth would cease, at least until he's finished playing. He's 58 from tying Aaron's home run record, a mark he should break in 2006, and the biggest obstacle he's likely to encounter being how often opposing managers will pitch to him.

Aaron, as Bonds knows, faced an entirely different set of circumstances: racial tension because Aaron was chasing a home run record held by a white icon. Death threats were common, and hate mail was voluminous.

"I don't think any of us will have that same situation," Bonds said. "I don't think you can even compare. Different era, different time. It was probably a lot harder for him than it is for us, a lot harder."

Bonds knows Aaron has nothing against him possibly breaking the home run record.

"To have Hank there, to have our great minority athletes support our other minority athletes, that's important to all of us," Bonds said. "No one understood (what he went through). A lot of the older writers know.

"Hank is always going to be our mentor, just like Jackie Robinson and the black athletes before us who went through the Negro League and couldn't participate in the major leagues at that time. They're the stepping stone to why the rest of us are here now. They'll always be our leaders, regardless of what we do. They're the ones who opened the doors for us. To me, they'll always be number one."

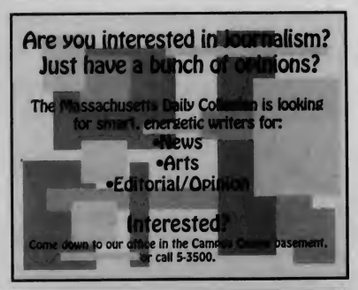
As it now stands, Bonds' all-time stats aren't quite on par with Aaron's or Ruth's. But if greatness can be measured by the impact one player had on his era than Bonds may stand alone at the top. He is the all-time leader in walks (2,264) and intentional walks (585), and he is five shy of breaking his single-season total of 198, set in 2002.

His 101 intentional walks shattered his record of 68, also set in '02, and they more than double Willie McCovey's standard of 45 that stood for 33 years.

No player has been pitched around more than Bonds has, and it's why Atlanta Braves manager Bobby Cox recently called him "the most terrifying hitter" he's ever seen.

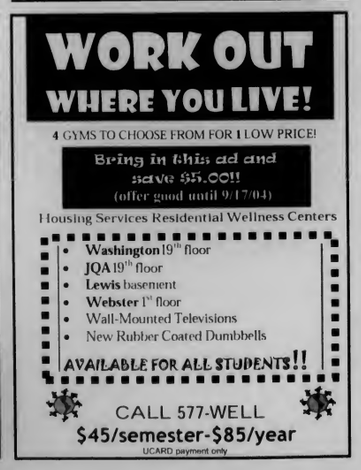
While Aaron was surrounded in the lineup at times during his career by Hall of Famers Eddie Mathews and Orlando Cepeda, Bonds has made do in recent years with Edgardo Alfonzo, Marquis Grissom and J.T. Snow - solid but not marquee players.

"It depends on how you look at it," Aaron said. "You take, for example, Michael Jordan. He was great, but he made other players around him great, and they couldn't focus on him. The same thing with the kid (Derek Jeter) over with the Yankees.



"When I played I was always in the mix of very good hitters, and maybe it's because they fed off me. I had Mathews and (Joe) Torre and Rico Carty and Cepeda. That always helped.

"Now you look at Barry and you see all the stats and all the things that he's accomplished, you have to marvel at some of the things he's done simply because he hasn't had the luxury of having great players around him."



Yet, Bonds has continued to produce at a stunning rate over a four-year span, shattering single-season records in homers, slugging percentage and on-base percentage while closing in on his second batting title in three years—all this after he turned 38.

"There aren't adjectives to describe what he does to me," Reggie Jackson said at an All-Star function. "I played. I know what it takes. I don't know who plays on his team. Edgardo Alfonzo, is that right? Jack (J.T.) Snow, Marquis Grissom. All those players helped him? It's somebody hitting behind him? I don't know how you calculate it. Nobody is as naked as he is."

UMass prepares to Bear down

Minutemen and Maine face-off in home opener

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After traveling over 3,000 miles across the country to lose to two of the most talented teams in the nation, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team is back home.

And they'll be here for a while.

The Minutemen will kick off a five game home stand tomorrow against the Maine Black Bears, with the opening touch scheduled for 1 p.m.

UMass is sure to be pleased with the extended home stand after suffering back-to-back losses to Santa Clara and the University of San Francisco, respectively, in the Diadora Classic. The Minutemen gave up a total of six goals on the weekend, an odd turn of events for a team that prides itself of defense.

One question for UMass will be whether it starts Nick Billman or Colin Burns in the net. Both keepers gave up three goals in their last starts, amidst an onslaught of 37 shots over the two games.

Tyler Pagano was the only goal scorer for the Minutemen with an unassisted turnaround shot against San Francisco. Pagano also had four shots in the game, with two on the net.

The Maroon and White have not had its offense going on full cylinders since last season. Its only explosive performance was a 3-1 route of the University of Montreal. Oral Bullen and Richard Higa will flank with Pagano tomorrow, in hopes of snapping their offensive slump.

Higa was one of the only Minutemen to have any attempts on goal, with two shots on goal against San Francisco, his first start of the season.

Maine (0-1-1,) is coming off mixed results in their recent Black Bear invitational, which included, the Cal Poly Mustangs, Quinnipiac, and Army. Maine suffered a loss to Army and tied Cal Poly scoring only one goal over the two contests. Cal Poly ended up winning the tournament with a 1-0 win over Army.

Adam Chenault was the only member of the Black Bears to score a goal, and was one of two players to be named to the all-tournament team from Maine. Senior midfielder Matthew Bernal, who had two shots in the tournament, was also given the honor.

One of the main weapons that the Black Bears possess is senior forward Justin Stockford, who had a total of three shots in the contests, all on goal. Stockford has been a staple in the Black Bear offense over the past few years and head coach Travers Evans will be looking towards him to pick up and motivate the rest of his offensive unit.

The most impressive performance from Maine came from their keeper, Chad Mungeon. Mungeon, a 6-foot-5 stopper out of Vermont, had 14 saves in his two appearances this year and used his size to preserve Maine's tie with Cal Poly.

Both Maine and the Minutemen had a stellar off-season of recruiting, both bringing in talent that will get into the action immediately. Neither squad has a large core of senior experience, thus tomorrow will be a good glimpse of what the future holds for both squad.

The Black Bears have brought in a very offensively minded group, headed by Seth Byers, a 6-foot-1 forward out of Cincinnati. Byers had played for the University of Wisconsin last year, but transferred to Maine, with hopes of adding to its offense.

Ernie Billittier chases down the ball during the 2003 campaign. Billittier and the Massachusets men's soccer team take on Maine tomorrow at Rudd Field.

Games can be our new memories

Andrew Merritt

Three years ago our country, our way of life, and indeed the world, changed in a matter of hours on an otherwise bright Tuesday morning. There is no corner, no crevice, no nook of the United States of American that hasn't felt in some way the impact of that awful day, and the horrendously malicious acts that marked it.

That includes the sporting world, which was thrown into turmoil about how to proceed. Some had to justify playing games just days after the attacks of Sept. 11; some had to grieve with the loss of coaches, teammates, and friends.

When the games could finally be played, when we could finally turn our eyes away from the wreckage in New York, Washington, and Pennsylvania, sports became a safe haven, a brief but happy diversion from the terrible nature of the world at the time. When the teams took the field, it was not as much a sign of moving on, as simply a sign of the stubborn hope, so characteristic of America, that we would survive, that we would still go about our daily lives.

In the three years since Sept. 11, our country has grown and changed in innumerable ways. We are more anxious about large, public gatherings, we are more serious about every possible link to terrorism, we are not as happy-go-lucky as we were on Sept. 10, and with good reason.

There is one exception, however, and that is sports.

We still play, watch, and treat our sports with the same fervor as before. The Red Sox and Yankees still sell out their games, and autumn Sundays are still filled with the cheers and excitement of professional football. Even the first Olympic Games to take place after 9/11 were marked more by their incredible competitions and athletes than the terror scares we all feared might arise in Greece. Sports, in many ways, have moved on.

The first anniversary of 9/11 was a nationwide day of grief. The names of the victims were read aloud at Ground Zero, news channels devoted almost the entire day to recapping all that happened in the wake of the attacks, and chapel bells rang here on the University of Massachusetts campus. We were again made to realize that we are a nation that grieves together. Just one year removed, Sept. 11, 2002 was a painful, somber day.

Last year, we began to move on. We didn't all come together as one — at least not to the degree that we had one and two-years prior. We went about our daily lives. Liberals went back to bashing President Bush for the War in Iraq, conservatives went back to bashing liberals for bashing Bush, and while the images and memories of 9/11 were still etched in our minds, as they always will be, the feeling was not as sharp. For those of us who weren't directly affected, Sept. 11, 2003 was not the same as the previous anniversary, it was not a day to drop everything and grieve, and perhaps that is a good thing.

We tend to stretch out our emotions in this country. We take a single victory, a single tragedy, and make it a week, month, or year-long affair. We attach ourselves to the details of big-time court cases. We call the poor woman "Laci," as if we all knew her well. We talk about the latest Amber Alert victim around the water cooler, rather than do something about it. It is as if we feel such guilt for any tragedy, that even the most unknown person's life can be thrust into the national spotlight so that we can all do our emotional penance.

So when we did finally move on, and allow ourselves to go more than a few days without thinking, writing, and crying about the events of 9/11, it might be all for the better that we could allow the most important event of the last 50 years to take its deserved place in our collective memory.

This is not to say that it was time to forget. Anyone who could

Misfortune doesn't kill their spirit

You might say the Massachusetts women's soccer team has more or less encountered some bad luck.

In a 4-1 loss to Yale last Friday, the Minutewomen hit the post three times. Sunday at Fairfield they out-shot and outcornered the Stags but still fell 2-1. It takes two hands to count the amount of players that have already been sidelined by injuries.

But rather than sit around bickering and moaning about their adversities and bad breaks, the Minutewomen (0-3) are playing on with what they've got, this time with even more intensity.

"You play who you got," head coach Jim Rudy said. "I had 16 [player] out there today, and everyone is going to get a chance to get in the ball game. These are the cards we've been dealt, so we're going to have to play them.

"It's not like they're not fit. They were awfully skillful [in practice Wednesday] and did everything pretty well."

But of course, Wednesday's practice was no walk in the park either. After running the squad through three fitness workouts and then scrimmaging, Rudy was pleased with their performance.

"The key word is patience," Rudy said. "I didn't think we'd have to be this patient, but that's what we've been dealt."

If something is going to break, this weekend's duel with the New Hampshire Wildcats, in Durham, N.H., will offer a prime chance.

"There's an old saying from my old German coach, 'after match is before match'," Rudy said. "We need to move on from what has happened, we can't afford to dwell on things. That's the best we can do."

The Wildcats return virtually the same squad from last season's 8-9-4 (5-2-2 America East) team that played to a 1-1 tie with the Minutewomen a year ago today. Chiara Best tapped in a goal with 87 seconds left in regulation to tie things up in a very physical battle, with UMass coming home with four injured

Forecasting the NFL

Jeff Howe

The summer is over. It is time for school, another big Red Sox September rally and, most importantly, the beginning of the quest for three championships in four years for the New England Patriots.

It's time for NFL Countdown, NFL Primetime, Sunday Night Football, Monday Morning Quarterback, Monday Night Countdown, Monday Night Football, Edge NFL Matchup and Sundays upon countless Sundays of nonstop NFL action to cure my six-month-old Super Bowl hangover.

Let us first get this out of the way. I love previews. I love making predictions. When I'm right, I look like a genius. When I'm wrong, I chalk it up as a mere fluke. Just like the Marcus Banks trade, it never happened.

Priest Holmes' trainer loves predictions, too. 2,300 yards, though? As if Holmes didn't already have a big enough target on his back, opposing linebackers now have more of an incentive to make Priest look more like an altar boy.

NFL running backs have done a great job of making headlines since the end of last season. Jamal Lewis was caught with enough marijuana to last Cheech and Chong enough time to produce their next film. Maybe Lewis was just bringing it to his running back counterpart, Ricky Williams, who recently retired after failing his third drug test.

Clinton Portis was so unhappy in Denver, a successful franchise, that he demanded a trade to Washington; a franchise that will be so financially hampered in two years that they won't be able to sign a new water boy, and Joe Gibbs may have to stretch his time machine even further back so he can begin suiting up for games, too. Ladainian Tomlinson signed a huge long-term contract to stay in San Diego, possibly the most poorly run organization in all of sports. LT had a chance of becoming one of the greatest running backs of all time (and he still may), but he won't be with a winning team until the downside of his career.

Corey Dillon finally got his wish and was traded away from the Bangles to the Pats. Willis McGahee is back, prompting Travis Henry to display his displeasure with his role in Buffalo, a scary sign as to how good McGahee may actually be. Eddie George has relocated to Dallas, Emmitt Smith is still destroying his legacy in Arizona and Barry Sanders was inducted into the Hall of Fame five years premature. Like I said, NFL running backs have been as busy as Pete Rose on a Vegas trip.

OK, it's time for the predictions. The teams will be ranked according to how they will finish in their division by their projected records. An asterisk indicates a wild card team. Their power rankings will be in parentheses.

And remember, what I say goes. I called the Pistons championship and the USA basketball flop not too long ago. These predictions are set in stone, so pack up everything you own and join Charlie Hustle in Vegas, baby.

AFC East

(1) New England Patriots (13-3): If they win their first three games, the Pats will be going for their record setting nineteenth straight against, who else, but Miami. If Tom Brady can stay healthy, the Patriots will be tearing down Jacksonville's goalposts in February.

(15) New York Jets* (9-7): If Chad Pennington can regain his form from 2002 this team will be much better than people think.

(20) Miami Dolphins (7-9): When all else fails, just be thankful that you're not a Dolphins fan. In the rare case that you are, just be thankful that your tax money wasn't used to support Ricky Williams' drug habit. Losing Williams and David Boston for the season were obviously out of anyone's control, but the front office is to blame for another underachieving season by the Dolphins. Dave Wannstedt should have been fired two years ago, and their quarterback carousel will continue to keep this offense out of rhythm. This will be a great place for Romeo Crennel to start his coaching career next season.

(23) Buffalo Bills (7-9): You are an offensive coordinator for a terrible team without an offense. As a reward, you are given the head coaching job of a team whose strength is its defense. Mike Malarkey, you have beaten the system.

AFC North

(5) Baltimore Ravens (11-5): Real men wear purple. They have arguably the best defense in the league, which is the sole reason they will win any games at all this season. Kyle Boller will impress his doubters, but Jamal Lewis is the Kobe Bryant of the NFL. He will spend the better part of a month in court, which is easily the biggest variable for the Ravens this season.

(16) Cincinnati Bengals (8-8): I understand that they spent their first draft pick a year ago on Carson Palmer, but how do you bench Jon Kitna after he resurrected his career for the second time. Palmer's experience will keep him at a rookie playing level, and that won't cut it in the AFC.

(27) Pittsburgh Steelers (6-10): I see Charlie Weiss in your future. Steelers fans.

(30) Cleveland Browns (4-12): Jeff Garcia already hates the organization. Kellen Winslow has already challenged the hearts of veterans. William Green hates being sober. The Dawg Pound will be a soap opera in 2004.

AFC South

(3) Tennessee Titans (11-5): Chris Brown will be a huge upgrade to Eddie George this year. One question, though. Is Steve McNair really that tough for playing through these injuries, or is he the biggest wimp in football for complaining about them all the time?

UMass reflects on lost collegue

By Erica Athas
Collegian Correspondent

Three years after September 11, 2001 the world continues to cope with the affects of the terrorist acts that killed over 2,000 people. On the University of Massachusetts campus however, many continue to deal with the death of one University faculty member, Christoffer M. Carstanjen.

"We are all still sad that he's not with us, and while we've come to acceptance about the tragedy, we still think about him," said Michael Gilbert, who is a UMass computer research analyst.

"He was one of the best customer service people that I ever met because he was so friendly to anyone who came into the OIT Department."

Carstanjen was Gilbert's colleague and friend before taking flight 175 on the morning of September 11 when his plane hit the second tower of the World Trade Center.

His plans included visiting San Diego for vacation. Afterwards he was planning on riding his motorcycle up the West Coast, an activity that he was passionate about.

Motorcycling, along with cooking and homebuilding were just a few of the numerous talents and ambitions that Carstanjen possessed in his life that was cut short at the age of 33.

Christoffer M. Carstanjen.

Myself and others memorialize him by trying to use the same friendly and compassionate approach to customers as he did," said Gilbert. "We also have been putting together a collage of pictures to remember him by," he said.

In addition to the collage, the OIT department has remembered Carstanjen by creating a "UMatter Award" in his honor in which the department awards a staff member that portrays similar characteristics that Carstanjen did.

The purpose of the awards is to spread the customer service skills that Carstanjen had and also be a memorial for him.

"Chris was the ultimate people-person. He was a very inquisitive, accepting person, who gave a friendly greeting to everyone who entered the department," said Gilbert.

Three years have passed, but according to Gilbert, there is no amount of time that will ever fully heal the wounds left by the attacks on America that ended the short lived life of Chris Carstanjen, whose harmonious nature touched many.

There is a garden with a plaque dedicated to Carstanjen outside of the OIT Department that Gilbert sees every morning before work. "I like to stop by it and just say 'hi' to Chris," said Gilbert. "We are all like a big family here in the department, everyone is close, so when you lose someone like Chris, it affects the entire family. People still think about him everyday."

This article concludes a two-part series on the September 11th attacks.

Boston pays tribute to those lost on September 11, '01

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON - Beneath a lowered flag in front of the Statehouse, about 150 family members of Sept. 11 victims paused for a moment of silence Saturday, the third anniversary of the terrorist attacks.

Air Force Col. Jim Ogonowski, whose brother John, piloted one of the hijacked planes, joined Gov. Mitt Romney in lowering the flag just before the national moment of silence at 8:46, when a hijacked airliner first struck a tower at the World Trade Center.

Ogonowski and Romney then addressed family members and about 30 members of the public who gathered outside the Statehouse gates to join in the remembrance.

As a small plane circled over head pulling a U.S. flag, Ogonowski urged grieving families to remember more than the horrors of that day.

Terrorists, he said, "rejoice at those memories."

"I ask you to remember what followed the attacks," he said. "Strangers helping strangers, neighbors helping neighbors, acts of good will everywhere. That's the part of September 11th the terrorist don't want to remember. "Perhaps the terrorists didn't know that in times of tragedy, Americans come together."

Romney said services like the 20 minute remembrance allow citizens whose freedom has come at the expense of Sept. 11 victims and their families "to revoke our complacency and forgetfulness of the price you have paid."

After the Statehouse event, a commemoration speaking event was planned at the Boston Opera House, with Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee, among the scheduled speakers.

Afterward, surviving family members of Sept. 11 victims were to gather at the Boston Public Garden, followed by a luncheon at a nearby hotel.

At 2 p.m., Romney was to present the Fourth Annual Madeline Amy Sweeney Award for Civilian Bravery in an invitation-only event in the Statehouse's House chamber. The award will recognize a citizen who demonstrated an act of courage and heroism.

The award honors Amy Sweeney, a flight attendant on the first plane to strike a Trade Center tower. Sweeney, of Acton, contacted ground crews to relay information about the hijackers before American Airlines Flight 11 crashed.

New construction at Newman Center

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The Newman Center has opened up a new Snack Shop as a temporary replacement to their cafeteria and grill, which is undergoing major renovation.

Alfred P. Casella Architects, hired by the diocese, is responsible for renovating the cafeteria. Improvements include a new grill, kitchen and boiler system. New interior oil tanks and interior fire doors on all levels will also be part of the reconstruction. Disabled people will find it easier to access the Center due to handicap access and a new elevator. A new lounge is also being built.

According to Mary Glen, wife of Gary Glen, Director of Food Services, the construction is unfortunately already behind schedule. The staff had hoped to have the grill working by September, but the construction isn't expected to be finished until December or January.

"Right now, the whole cafeteria is just a gutted hole," said Mary Glen

When Gary Glen and Jason Wonsey, the Operating Manager of Food Services, realized that the cafeteria would not be ready to open until midyear, they decided to set up a temporary Snack Shop has been set up in the Fr. Quigley room at the Newman Center, to be closed down when the café reopens.

Business, however, has not been good. "We've only had three customers so far today," said Glen on Sunday, "and they were all on their way to mass. Even some of our regulars have left, finding other places with a grill. But they've told me that they'll be back once the café is finished." Glen hopes that business will pick up as word spreads about the shop, which just opened Wednesday, September 8.

"I also hope more people will come in once we set up the OCMP system; right now we're cash only." Glen says that the shop has a variety of fresh foods and coffee for breakfast and fresh sandwiches for lunch that she hopes will attract hungry students.

One of the biggest problems that the low customer turnout has caused is the leftovers. Glen says that she likes "all of my foods to be fresh. I don't want to just hang onto the stuff." After the first mass since students returned to school, the leftover food was distributed to parishioners. "The priest likes to do that as a kind of welcome back to the community."

Sunday however, as Glen looked around at the piles of bagels and donuts, and at the pots of coffee, she said, "I just don't know what we're going to do with all this."

With such a small shop as the only substitute for what was a large cafeteria, many students who had worked in the cafeteria have had to find other work.

"Manning this place," said Glen, gesturing to the shop, "is kind of a two person endeavor, but I am I touch with some of the students who used to work in the cafeteria and I hope they can come back when we reopen."

The renovations of the cafeteria aren't the only repairs that have been going on at the Newman Center. Over the summer, asbestos were removed from the boiler room and other areas of the center, causing the hot water to be turned off for a few weeks in July, according to Chuck Verner, who gives updates on the construction in the Newman Center Communitas, a community bulletin. The removal of asbestos is now complete and the hot water was restored in August.

The diocese for the Newman Center's renovations considered three companies. Alfred P. Casella Architects gave the lowest bid. It is the construction company that is responsible for the "schedule and timeline for completion," says Verner.

The Snack Shop is open 8a.m.-2p.m. on Monday through Friday and 8a.m.-noon on Sundays.

SPIRE under close watch

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

After a week of glitches and flaws, SPIRE was available to students this weekend, but the service may have only been temporary until further assessments can be made.

This summer, the SPIRE system underwent some major renovations and updates and according to the UMass News Office, there were several glitches and problems that were not anticipated. Consequently, with the heavy volume of students, faculty members and administration all trying to register for classes and maneuver Add/Drop while faculty members and the administration were not.

The Office of Information Technology (OIT) assumed that it was more important and more accessible for the administration to use the system during the weekdays and simpler for students to logon over the weekend.

According to the News Office, if SPIRE performed well this weekend then it could be available to everyone soon. However, if there are still significant problems, then SPIRE could potentially still only be available during the aforementioned phases.

The plan is to assess the traffic over the weekend first thing this morning.

If students still cannot access the system and need to clarify their schedule locations, they can visit 217 Whitmore to obtain a printout of their schedules. Also, a list of classes and their locations can be found on the registrars website by visiting www.umass.edu. Additionally, an email was sent out on Saturday to all students informing them about the current status of SPIRE.

Southwest yellow lot transformed

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Students with a car on campus dread it – receiving a permit for a dark, dirt lot that's a good 15-minute walk from their dorm. However, this year parking services has made an effort to relieve a number of students from that stress by giving the Southwest yellow lot a makeover that consisted of repaving and expanding the lot as well as adding better lighting.

"The Southwest yellow lot was one of the worst of our student lots," said Michael Brennan, manager of parking services. "The money to redo the lot came from permit fees and visitor revenues. We do try to save every penny, it all goes into our repair and renovate fund."

Yellow Lot 11 was recently repaved.

Brennan said parking services does not receive one cent of the money obtained from ticket citations on campus since it all goes into the Financial Aid Scholarship fund. He added that the fee students pay after their car has been towed is given to the tow contractor.

The cost of a permit increased by five dollars from last year, bringing prices to $95 for seniors and $150 for juniors, sophomores and freshman to park their cars on campus.

"That's just the way the model was set up, and how we can afford to spend," said Brennan. "We are going to get the bill shortly (for improvements made to the Southwest yellow lot) which will be roughly $80,000-100,000.

"There were a few small changes when we go into the construction, such as the entrance ways. In years past the entrances weren't really reinforced, but they really needed to be since the entrance takes a lot of beating. Plus we added new spaces, new lighting and really enhanced the whole lot down there. We've been saving to do that – things aren't cheap, but now it's a beautiful new lot that should last for years and years."

Students on campus who park in the lot seemed pleased with the improvements made to it over the summer.

"I think it's nice that UMass has finally gotten around to paving the Southwest yellow lot," said Jesse Malloy, a senior English major. "To charge students such a substantial fee to park their car a solid 10 to 15 minute walk from their dorm room in a dirt parking lot is ridiculous."

However, Malloy said he doesn't think it is fair that hundreds of students must still park their cars in the yellow lot behind the Mullin's Center, even though they are paying the same amount of money for a permit.

"We always get asked, 'why not pave the lot behind the Mullin's Center?'" Brennan said. "The reason is because it is much worse, and a much larger lot. Most people don't know, and it is unfortunate the way the lot is situated, but at the end of the lot through the woods is a river. So you can't put that much paving down without expensive drainage systems in order to stop rain water from rolling into the river along with the chemicals in the pavement."

According to Brennan, it would cost about two or three million dollars to fund a project that large.

"Eventually we will pave it, maybe not next year but maybe in a few," he said. "We would love to pave that lot – it would take a lot of our headaches away."

But for now, senior Megan Burden is glad to see the Southwest yellow lot paved; however she believes the set up of the expanded spaces could pose a possible danger.

More parking spaces makes it easier for Southwest students to find spots.

"I like that it's newly paved, but I think there should be another road on the other side of new spaces," said the communications major. "It is dangerous because your car could get clipped if you're backing out and someone didn't see you, but I'm glad to see that the money from our permits is going towards renovations of the parking lot."

Brennan explained that the way the lot is set up – with the new spaces added to the north end of the lot, leaving a dead-end situation for those unable to find a space and are left to back their cars up – was done in order to maximize as many spots as possible.

"You find that in a lot of parking scenarios," Brennan said. "Our other choice would've been to put a road there on the other side, which would have meant fewer spaces. Then individuals who didn't get in because the lot was sold out would end up behind the Mullin's Center.

"So for the little difficulty they just have to bare with it and drive safe; it's not something that's never been encountered before. It could be frustrating if you drive down and have to back up, but I'd rather have more space. Our goal and parking services' philosophy is that we believe we should provide as much parking as possible around all residential areas."

Ivan is on his way

By Jay Ehrehart
Associated Press

GEORGE TOWN, Cayman Islands - Hurricane Ivan battered the Cayman Islands with ferocious 150-mph winds Sunday, flooding homes, ripping off roofs and toppling trees three stories tall as its powerful eye thundered past just offshore.

Ivan has killed at least 60 people across the Caribbean and was expected to strike western Cuba, where residents have dubbed the storm "Ivan the Terrible," on Monday. More than 1 million Cubans were evacuated from their homes.

The storm also could brush the Florida Keys and parts of Florida's Gulf Coast. Mexico issued a hurricane watch and tropical storm warning for the northeastern Yucatan Peninsula.

Ivan, a huge hurricane, which grew to the most powerful Category 5 with 165 mph winds Saturday, lost some strength before tearing into the wealthy Cayman Islands chain, a popular scuba diving destination and banking center.

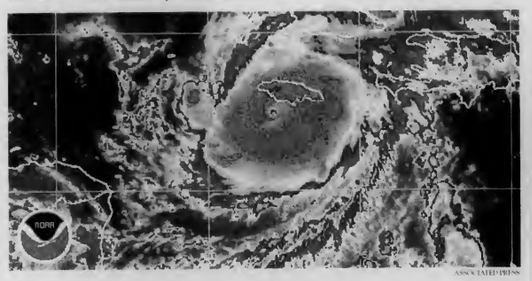
"It's as bad as it can possibly get," Justin Uzzell, 35, said by telephone from his fifth-floor refuge in Grand Cayman. "It's a horizontal blizzard. The air is just foam."

High winds prevented officials from assessing damage immediately. But Donnie Ebanks, deputy chairman of the British territory's National Hurricane Committee, estimated that as many as half of Grand Cayman's 15,000 homes were damaged.

At 5 p.m. EDT, Ivan's eye was about 225 miles southeast of Cuba's western tip. Hurricane-force winds extended 90 miles and tropical storm-force winds extended 175 miles. Ivan was moving west-northwest at near 10 mph and was expected to turn northwest by Monday.

It was projected to pass near or over Cuba's western end by Monday afternoon or evening. The U.S. National Hurricane Center in Miami said the storm surge could reach 25 feet with dangerous, battering waves.

The Cayman Islands were better prepared for the punishment than Grenada and Jamaica, which were slammed by Ivan in the past week – though Jamaica was spared a direct hit Saturday. The Caymans have strict building codes and none of the shantytowns and tin shacks common elsewhere in the Caribbean.



The Hurricane Center said ham radio operators on Grand Cayman reported that people were standing on the roofs of homes because of storm surges of up to 8 feet above normal tide levels.

While it was nearly a direct hit on Grand Cayman, the eye of the storm did not make landfall, passing instead over water just south of the island, said Rafael Mojica, a Hurricane Center meteorologist.

Still, emergency officials said residents from all parts of the island were reporting blown-off roofs and flooded homes as Ivan's shrieking winds and driving rain approached Grand Cayman, the largest of three islands that comprise the British territory of 45,000 people.

The government said Grand Cayman was "experiencing the most severe portion of Hurricane Ivan" on

At 3 p.m., a reception was planned at Boston Common to welcome the Beyond the 11th Charity Cyclists, led by Sept. 11 widows Susan Retik and Patti Quigley. The women planned to bicycle about 250 miles over three days from Ground Zero in New York to a new Sept. 11 memorial in the Boston Public Garden. On Saturday, they planned to ride through Dover, where they were to be joined by 200 cyclists, each representing one of the Sept. 11 victims from New England.

Money raised from the ride will go to Beyond the 11th, a non-profit organization dedicated to helping widows who have been affected by war and terrorism in other parts of the world.

Both jets that hit the towers in New York City originated from Boston's Logan International Airport. According to an Associated Press database, 93 of the Sept. 11 victims were residents of Massachusetts and 197 had Massachusetts ties.

US Airways declares bankruptcy

By Matt Barakat
Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Va. - US Airways Group Inc., the nation's seventh-largest airline, filed for bankruptcy protection Sunday for the second time in two years. The company's president vowed to continue restructuring the airline into a low-cost carrier during the bankruptcy process.

"We have come too far and accomplished too much to simply stop the process and not succeed," said Bruce Lakefield, US Airways' president and chief executive. "A restructured US Airways with low costs and low fares will be a dynamic competitor."

The Chapter 11 filing in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Alexandria came after US Airways was unable to obtain $800 million in annual cost cuts from its workers' unions that the airline said it needed to stay afloat.

Last Monday, a deeply divided pilots union refused to allow its membership to vote on a company proposal that would have cut pay by 20 percent and retirement plan contributions by 50 percent.

As recently as Friday, US Airways made a last-ditch effort to reach a deal with the pilots, offering a proposal with minimum pay cuts that would have required more flight hours each month, putting more pilots at risk of furlough.

Some pilot representatives who opposed the new deal said the pilots and other US Airways workers had made enough concessions during the company's first trip into bankruptcy in 2002. Then, the unions collectively agreed to contract concessions of more than $1 billion a year.

The airline had hoped a deal with its pilots might spur other unions to take action.

The bankruptcy filing probably will cost federal taxpayers. The government loaned the airline $900 million last year as part of a special program to assist airlines after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The airline still owes Uncle Sam $718 million, and it will ultimately be up to a bankruptcy court to determine the government's place in line among the airline's creditors.

US Airways said Sunday that it has an agreement in place with the government and other lenders to use some of its cash reserves to continue operations while in bankruptcy.

A hearing is scheduled Monday morning in U.S. Bankruptcy Court.

US Airways said customers will notice no changes to operations as a result of the filing and that the company will seek permission to continue its frequent flyer program.

Florida braces for storm; Ivan blasts Carribean

Sunday morning.

"We know there is damage and it is severe," said Wes Emanuel of the Government Information Service.

The airport runway was flooded and trees were wrenched from their roots, including a giant Cayman mahogany next to the government headquarters in downtown George Town. Radio Cayman went off the air temporarily before resuming broadcasts.

Though there were no immediate reports of injuries in the Caymans, the death toll elsewhere rose as hospital officials in Jamaica reported four more deaths, for a total of 15. At least 34 people were killed in Grenada, where the hurricane left widespread destruction. Scattered deaths occurred on other islands and in Venezuela.

A tropical storm watch was posted Sunday morning for the lower third of the 120-mile Florida Keys, from below Marathon through Key West and the Dry Tortugas.

A mandatory evacuation was ordered for tourists and the island chain's 79,000 residents. Streets, bars, hotels and shops in Key West were mostly empty, even as Keys officials said they were "cautiously optimistic" the hurricane could spare the islands from its worst winds.

In Cuba, the threatened area includes densely populated Havana, where traffic was light Sunday morning as most took shelter. About 1.3 million people across the island of 11.2 million were evacuated, with most seeking refuge with relatives.

Condoleeza Rice denies allegations

WASHINGTON - National security adviser Condoleezza Rice on Sunday denied assertions in a new book that she and other top Bush administration officials ignored warnings about the abuse of prisoners at the Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

New Yorker writer Seymour Hersh, discussing the book set for release Monday, said senior military and national security officials received warnings from subordinates in 2002 and 2003 about such mistreatment.

Hersh said Rice held meetings on the issue and it was brought to the attention of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld before it "disappeared."

Rice said that in the fall of 2002, the White House "was made aware that there were some concerns that people might have been held at Guantanamo who didn't meet the definition of unlawful combatant."

"There were also early on ... some concerns about conditions of overcrowding. But nothing that suggested, to my recollection, that there were abuses ... going on at Guantanamo, and certainly nothing that would suggest the kind of thing that went on in Abu Ghraib," she said, referring to the infamous Iraqi prison.

Nearly all the approximately 585 detainees at the base were captured in Afghanistan after U.S. forces invaded in October 2001 in response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The U.S. government defines an enemy combatant as "an individual who was part of or supporting Taliban or al-Qaida forces, or associated forces that are engaged in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners."

A person classified as an enemy combatant can be held without being charged with a crime and without legal representation until the conflict has ended.

Rice told CNN's Late Edition that when the administration learned there might be people at Guantanamo who failed to meet the standard of unlawful combatant, "We looked at the cases, put together a process to try and make sure that the right people were being held."

She also said the United States worked hard to improve conditions at the Cuban prison. "I do not recall being told of anything concerning prisoner abuse," Rice said.

Rice said she and a deputy, John Gordon, talked about conditions at Guantanamo and worked with the Pentagon to ease overcrowding. "I was also informed that there were concerns that people might have been held there who shouldn't have been held there. We held several meetings then, and all of this was referred to the Defense Department for action," she said.

Even before release of Chain of Command: The Road From 9/11 to Abu Ghraib, the Pentagon had issued a public statement about inquiries into the book by Hersh, who is widely credited with disclosing the Abu Ghraib prison scandal.

"It appears that Mr. Seymour Hersh's upcoming book apparently contains many of the numerous unsubstantiated allegations and inaccuracies which he has made in the past based upon unnamed sources," the Pentagon said in a statement Friday.

The statement said detainee operations in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere "have been examined extensively" by the Defense Department and an independent panel, and that investigations continue.

"Thus far, these investigations have determined that no responsible official of the Department of Defense approved any program that could conceivably have authorized or condoned the abuses seen at Abu Ghraib," the statement said.

The Pentagon urged that if any of Hersh's anonymous sources want to come forward and offer evidence "to the contrary, the department welcomes them to do so."

Hersh, who appeared on NBC's Meet the Press, said that after his New Yorker series on Abu Ghraib, "people who worked inside the White House came to me and said, 'Look, this is much more far-reaching than you think.'"

November deadline for Iran

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BERLIN - Europe's major powers have agreed to set a November deadline on Iran to meet demands meant to resolve concerns that it is secretly trying to make nuclear weapons, in a confidential document made available Saturday to The Associated Press.

The draft resolution was prepared by France, Germany and Britain for Monday's start of a key meeting in Vienna, Austria, of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

The draft contains a so-called "trigger mechanism," warning of possible further steps - which diplomats defined as shorthand for referral of Iran's case to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose economic and political sanctions.

The draft is likely to undergo changes before the three nations submit it at the board meeting of the IAEA. And it still has to be approved by two-thirds of the 35 board members.

But it is significant because it puts the three European countries the closest they have formally been to the United States on what to do about Iran and activities that Washington insists show Tehran is trying build the nuclear bomb.

Up to now, the European countries have resisted U.S. attempts to have Iran hauled before the Security Council or even hint on a date for such possible action.

Iran says its nuclear program is solely for energy production.

The draft says Iran must suspend all activities related to nuclear enrichment - including manufacturing of centrifuges - and must meet all requirements posed by the IAEA in its probe into Iran's nuclear activities before IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei reports to the board again in November.

On the basis of ElBaradei's report, the board will probably make a "definite determination on whether or not further steps are required," the draft said.

"This is a 'trigger' that can be pulled if the November board deems it necessary," said one diplomat.

While the last board meeting in June censured Iran for past cover-ups and warned it has little time left to disprove it has a nuclear weapons program, it didn't impose a deadline or even indirectly threaten sanctions.

But since then, Iran's earlier commitments to stop some uranium enrichment and related activities have eroded - alienating the three European nations.

Enriched uranium can be used to generate electricity or make nuclear weapons. Iran last year agreed to freeze enrichment programs but has since resumed testing, assembling and making centrifuges, a key component of such activities. Last week, it confirmed an IAEA report that it planned to convert more than 40 tons of raw uranium into uranium hexafluoride, the gas put into centrifuges for enrichment.

Iran's original suspension pledge came in a deal with Britain, Germany and France but fell short of European demands that Tehran scrap enrichment.

Iran is not obliged to halt enrichment under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, but Tehran has been under international pressure for more than a year to fully renounce enrichment to counterbalance suspicions generated by nearly two decades of clandestine nuclear activities that came to light only two years ago.

On Tuesday, it offered to re-impose a partial freeze on some of those activities, in an apparent move to deflect growing international exasperation ahead of Monday's meeting.

But diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the AP they had not heard of a concrete agreement with the IAEA on that issue by Saturday. The text of the draft had no reference to any commitment by Tehran to re-impose its enrichment freeze.

The draft has some positive language. It notes "the general positive ... Iranian cooperation" with the IAEA, while asserting that "the process of providing information needs, in certain instances, to be accelerated."

But it notes "with serious concern ... that Iran has not heeded repeated calls from the board to suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities."

It deeply regrets that Iran's partial freeze of enrichment and related programs falls significantly short of what the IAEA wants and also that Iran has since reversed some of those decisions.

The draft expresses concern about Iran's plans to convert its raw uranium into hexafluoride. And it "urges Iran to immediately and verifiably to suspend all enrichment-related activities, notably the manufacture of centrifuge components, the assembly and testing of centrifuges, and the production of feed material."

It asks ElBaradei to present a comprehensive review of his two-year investigation into Iran's nuclear programs, a record of Tehran's cooperation and a judgment on Iran's willingness to fully suspend "all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities."

BAGRAM, Afghanistan — The trail has gone cold in the hunt for suspected Sept. 11 mastermind Osama bin Laden three years after the audacious attacks, but the al-Qaida chief and his No. 2 are still orchestrating strikes like the recent suicide car bombing of a U.S. security firm in Kabul, a top American commander said Saturday.

Maj. Gen. Eric Olson told The Associated Press the military had not intercepted any radio traffic or instructions from either bin Laden or his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri. But he said the involvement of well-trained foreign fighters in attacks near the Pakistani border convinced him that the fugitive leaders were pulling the strings.

"What we see are their techniques and their tactics here in Afghanistan, so I think it is reasonable to assume that the senior leaders are involved in directing those operations," Olson, the operational commander of U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan, said in an interview.

The Aug. 26 car bomb which killed about 10 people, including three Americans, at the office of a firm providing bodyguards for President Hamid Karzai also bears the hallmarks of the militant network, Olson said.

"We've even tied it to a group that has ties to al-Qaida. It could be a splinter group of some sort," Olson told AP after a ceremony at the U.S. base at Bagram north of Kabul to mark the third anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"It's a new group, apparently a group that was carved from al-Qaida," he said. "They have members in Pakistan and they have been active in Afghanistan, and this recent attack is the most blatant example." He declined to elaborate.

There were reports Saturday of fresh fighting in the country, where more than 400 people — mostly Afghan security forces and rebels — have died in political violence this year.

Known terrorist and Sept. 11 mastermind Osama Bin Laden.

In the troubled southern province of Zabul, Afghan officials said two Arabs were killed and two more captured in a firefight with U.S. and Afghan troops, and that Taliban gunmen killed two elders for supporting the government. In neighboring Kandahar, eight Taliban fighters and three Afghan soldiers were reported killed in two more incidents.

Olson, a native of New York City, addressed some of the 18,000 mainly U.S. troops he commands. About 300 soldiers had gathered in a dusty tent to hear readings from the Bible and the Quran, patriotic songs and speeches reminding them of their mission.

Some wept as they watched videos of how the hijacked jetliners felled the World Trade Center towers in New York and devastated a wing of the U.S. Department of Defense three years ago. "We're here to prevent future ceremonies, future Sept. 11s," said Maj. Andy Preston, an infantryman from Edmond, Okla., who was working at the Pentagon when it was hit.

The U.S. invasion of Afghanistan that followed, Operation Enduring Freedom, quickly routed the government of the hardline Taliban movement and scattered the al-Qaida fighters and leaders it harbored. The Taliban has regrouped and sustained an insurgency across the south and east of the country, which Olson said was supported also by foreign fighters.

Olson said some militants attacking U.S. forces along the Pakistani border with mortars and rockets expertly adjust their aim - betraying a level of training not commonly seen among Taliban fighters.

Arabs, including Saudis and Yemenis, were among fighters recently detected in Kandahar province. Russian chatter was intercepted by radio monitors in the former al-Qaida stronghold of Khost, suggesting Chechen and Uzbeks were operating there, he said.

Blaze kills 10

By Anita Chang
Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio - A suspected arson fire raced through an apartment complex in suburban Columbus on Sunday, killing 10 people who lived in the same apartment and forcing others to jump from third-story windows to escape.

At least 53 people were left homeless by the blaze in Prairie Township, which destroyed the building's roof and third floor, melted siding and left its wooden skeleton exposed.

Antonio Noriega said firefighters pulled him from a ladder as he tried to rescue his brothers and nephews.

"My family is dead," Noriega said. Eight of his relatives and two friends lived together and Noriega did not believe any of them made it out of the building. Authorities wouldn't say whether others were still missing.

The fire came just six weeks after three fires were set in the same building in an empty apartment and hallway, said Fire Chief Steve Feustel. There were no suspects and no known witnesses to Sunday's suspected arson, he said.

The victims, including a child, lived on the third floor and tried to escape, Feustel said.

"They were out of their beds. They didn't die in their sleep," he said.

Two people, including a woman who jumped from a window, were treated and released from a hospital, a nursing supervisor said.

Residents of the gutted 24-unit building stood vigil outside, some wrapped in blankets, some quietly sobbing. Dozens more joined them as news spread.

The fire started about 2:30 a.m. in the basement or the first floor, but the cause was not known, Feustel said. He said the fire burned fiercely in a stairway, blocking people from escaping.

Pascasie Mulanigulwa, who lives in the next building, was awakened by the light through her bedroom window. "I saw people jumping down out of the third floor. It was terrible," she said.

The American Red Cross was handing out water, coffee and doughnuts, and helping residents find temporary housing Sunday.

Noriega said his family members were all immigrants from Mexico who came to Columbus four years ago. Many in the family worked together at a landscaping company.

"My family, they're sleeping and the fire is coming fast," he said. "I can't help my brothers."

A hydrant that had been knocked over delayed getting water to light the fire, which was already shooting through the roof when crews arrived, Feustel said.

"These people were probably already down by the time fire crews were on the scene," he said.

Suspicious cloud is ruled not a nuclear explosion

By Christopher Torchia
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea - A huge mushroom cloud that reportedly billowed up from North Korea was not caused by a nuclear explosion, South Korean and U.S. officials said Sunday, but they said the cause was a mystery.

Secretary of State Colin Powell confirmed that unusual activity had recently been detected at some of North Korea's atomic sites, but said there was no concrete evidence the North's secretive communist regime was preparing for its first nuclear test explosion.

The South Korean news agency Yonhap reported Sunday that a mammoth explosion in North Korea produced a mushroom cloud more than 2 miles across Thursday. It said the blast was stronger than an April explosion that killed 160 people and injured an estimated 1,300 at a North Korean railway station when a train carrying oil and chemicals apparently hit power lines.

"There was no indication that was a nuclear event of any kind," Powell said of Thursday's incident. "Exactly what it was, we're not sure." Kim Jong-min, spokesman for the South Korean presidential office, told Yonhap: "Currently, we are trying to find out in detail the exact character, cause and size of the accident, but we don't think North Korea conducted a nuclear test."

China's government, which has the closest relations with North Korea, had no immediate comment about the reported explosion.

Before Yonhap's report, The New York Times' Sunday editions said senior U.S. intelligence officials had seen signs of activities that some analysts thought might indicate North Korea was preparing a nuclear bomb test. Other experts were more cautious in their assessments, but the developments were considered worrisome enough for the White House to be alerted, the Times said.

Appearing on ABC's 'This Week,' Powell said there were "some activities taking place at some sites that we are watching carefully, but it is not conclusive that they're moving toward a test or they're just doing some maintenance at that site."

Later, on 'Fox News Sunday,' Powell expressed skepticism North Korea would stage a nuclear test explosion.

The North Koreans "know this would not be a sensible step for them to take," he said. "And it is not just the reaction that they might see in the United States; it's their own neighbors."

On Saturday, North Korea said recent revelations that South Korea conducted secret nuclear experiments involving uranium and plutonium made the communist state more determined to pursue its own nuclear programs.

The South Korean experiments in 1982 and 2000, which the South said did not reflect an attempt to develop weapons, are likely to further complicate six-nation talks aimed at dismantling North Korea's nuclear development. Another round of talks involving the United States, Russia, Japan, China and the two Koreas is tentatively scheduled this month in Beijing.

Washington is pushing for North Korea to fully disclose all of its nuclear activities and allow outside monitoring before it receives any assistance for its struggling economy. North Korea wants energy aid, an end to economic sanctions and removal from Washington's list of state sponsors of terrorism.

"North Korea is looking for assurances that we're not going to invade it, (that) we have no hostile intent," Powell said. "They're looking for benefits for giving up their nuclear capability and their nuclear infrastructure. And what we're debating is what will it take to give them the assurances they need and what benefits would they expect over the long haul."

But, he said, the United States will not "reward them for doing something they should've have been doing in the first place. So we're into a very intense period of negotiations."

Yonhap said the explosion occurred at 11 a.m. Thursday in Yanggang province near North Korea's border with China.

"We understand that a mushroom-shaped cloud about 3.5 to 4 kilometers (2.1 to 2.5 miles) in diameter was monitored during the explosion," Yonhap quoted an unidentified diplomatic source as saying in Seoul, South Korea's capital.

Yonhap said an unidentified South Korean official reported seismic activity related to two blasts in North Korea at 11 p.m. Wednesday and 1 a.m. Thursday. It said a source in China's capital said the explosion left a crater big enough to be seen by a satellite.

Thursday was the anniversary of North Korea's founding on Sept. 9, 1948 - a date North Korean leader Kim Jong Il uses to stage performances and other events designed to bolster loyalty among his countrymen.

Thousands Protest Sharon Gaza Evacuation Plan

By Josef Federman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Tens of thousands of Jewish settlers and their backers demonstrated in Jerusalem on Sunday against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to evacuate all settlements from Gaza and four West Bank enclaves in a rally held amid warnings of assassinations and civil war.

The withdrawal plan has upset the Israeli political scene since it was announced last year, turning Sharon's backers into opponents and detractors into supporters. Skeptical Palestinians believe the whole plan is a trick to annex large parts of the West Bank to Israel.

The demonstrators filled downtown Jerusalem, shutting down much of the city, to protest the planned pullout.

Most of those filling downtown were Orthodox Jews, many of them teenage girls in long skirts or youths wearing knit skullcaps. A huge banner behind the stage set the theme: "Disengagement tears the people apart." Many waved blue-and-white Israeli flags.

Organizers pledged to prevent incitement to violence, but there were also some ominous signs.

One placard warned that the head of Sharon's disengagement committee would "not be forgiven." Another showed a picture of Sharon under the words, "The Dictator."

Another sign said, "A time to love, a time to hate," quoting the biblical Book of Ecclesiastes.

After the demonstration, hundreds of participants, many holding candles, marched to a square near Sharon's official residence, where they called on the prime minister to resign. The rally dispersed peacefully.

At a Cabinet meeting Sunday morning, Sharon warned of statements of "grave incitement" that were "directing toward a civil war."

"There are not enough voices being heard among the Cabinet on this subject," Sharon complained.

The issue of incitement has been especially sensitive in Israel since the Nov. 4, 1995, assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by an ultra-nationalist Jew opposed to Rabin's policy favoring territorial concessions to the Palestinians in exchange for peace. Some Israeli commentators have compared the current atmosphere to the vitriolic period preceding Rabin's death.

Mainstream settler leaders rejected Sharon's statement as an attempt to paint all of them with the extremist brush.

"We are completely against violence or threats of violence," Settlers Council spokesman Josh Hasten said. "These blanket statements unjustly put an entire group into a category."

Israel's minority Orthodox Jews revere the West Bank as part of the biblical Jewish homeland.

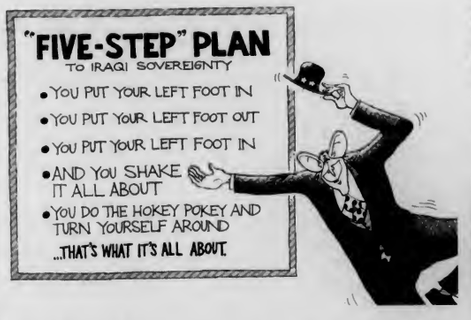
September 11: Have we forgotten?

One of the most important aspects of grief is its timetable. As human beings, we are blessed both with the ability to feel great pain and sorrow for our fellow man and woman, and with the ability to eventually move on, to overcome even the greatest catastrophe and reenter our normal, everyday routines.

Some might argue that the grief will never end for the families and friends of the victims of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, that some of us will always be oppressed with the awful memory of what happened that day. For the rest of us, those who weren't directly affected, the length of our actual grief will certainly be shorter. Nobody should be expected to feel agony every day for the rest of their lives for an event that only barely touched them. It would be an unbearable existence.

So we move on. We allow our emotions to fade, to become the part of our permanent memory that we only recall on anniversaries. It's a natural part of the process of grief. We are dynamic beings, our lives and our minds are in constant flux. Moving on, though it comes at a different rate for everyone, is inevitable, and we should embrace our ability to reclaim the daily rhythm we had before 9/11.

However, there is a frightening message behind the fact that quite literally nobody — not even the organizers or speakers — were on the campus lawn outside the Student Union Saturday, when a vigil of remembrance was scheduled to take place. A pair of Collegian staffers arrived at the Student Union around 1 p.m., the scheduled start time, and waited until 2 p.m. without a single participant in sight. A podium and microphone were set up, as well as a P.A. system, but no one was there to use them. At press time, there was no report of any change in the schedule for the observance — as far as we know, nobody came.



Among other things, this campus is known for its activism. We hold rallies to save the whales, we hold rallies to save third-world countries, we hold rallies sometimes, it seems, just to hold a rally. The average UMass student will, at one point or another during his or her time here, find a cause to get behind. From the editorial and opinion page of this publication, to the numerous other outposts for political, sociological, and general opinion, we don't hold back. We come out in droves to support or decry a movement, action, or ideal. It's a vital part of the spirit of this campus.

And yet, not one person could find the time on an idle, beautiful Saturday afternoon, to stop by and check out the vigil. Perhaps part of the problem was the lack of publicity the vigil received. It was noted on some banners in residence halls as part of the first week festivities, and it is listed on the UMass website, though it wasn't exactly front-and-center. Otherwise, it seems organizers of the vigil had the idea, and then didn't actually think to make it known to everyone possible. Maybe that was purposeful, maybe not.

Either way, some students and other members of the UMass community simply must have seen something about the plan for the vigil. So what happened? Have we all moved on well past the need to congregate and share the memory of our greatest tragedy since the bombing of Pearl Harbor with our fellow members of the community? Have we simply grown tired of the repeated references to 9/11 found everywhere from the Presidential campaigns to our hometown? Is it possible that we are beginning to forget the emotions of that day?

Over 16,000 people showed up to the football game Saturday night. Imagine if even half that number had just stopped by the lawn Saturday afternoon, just to remember for a few moments the day that none of us should ever forget.

Novels in new form

Allison Edles

A new form of literature has arrived combining even more so the use of technology and creativity. Mr. He Xingnlan of China recently released his short novel to audiences everywhere, except not in bookstores, but on their cell phones. The author's novel entitled Out of the Fortress, appeared on many cell phone screens throughout China on Saturday. The novel itself is only 4,200 characters, appears in blocks of 70 characters at a time and will be made available over a period of 2 days.

This new wave of technology has expanded to a point where everyday books are beginning to become obsolete. Cell phones have many practical uses, but being used as an outlet for reading published novels is not an adequate way to inform and entertain the masses.

The actual publication company that is distributing He's book is called hurray.com.cn and is also providing a service that allows cell phone readers, rather than actually reading it on their screen, to call up the publisher and listen to a recording of the story each day as the chapters progress. This apparently is becoming the modern-day equivalent of a book-on-tape. And all of this is readily available for a fee that is similar to that of a text message which will be charged to the cell phone owner's account.

For many people in today's society, technological advances are what propel us from day to day. The cellular phone has become a staple in worldwide culture that has become more of a crutch than anything else. People no longer write numbers down and remember them, but have them programmed into their phonebook and rather than dialing the number, use voice-activation methods or the back-back down-down motion to find the appropriate number to call. According to He In the New York Times "Why bother with itsy-bitsy evolutionary steps when you can build something new altogether?" By having novels available to us on our cell phones, it brings us to an era where we're taking one step forward and two steps back.

Books were meant to be read. History has spent millions of years uncovering facts and recording them in bound books to pass on through the ages. A book cannot be wiped out by accidentally hitting a "delete" button and cannot be forgotten or erased by having too many in your inbox. He has referred to his text-message story as a "novel," which by definition is incorrect. According to Merriam-Webster's Online Dictionary, a "novel" is defined as an invented prose narrative that is usually long and complex and deals especially with human experience through a usually connected sequence of events. The key in that definition are the words "long and complex." He's "novels" are neither long nor complex. They are simple stories of about 4,200 characters that the New York Times described as being "a marriage of haiku and Hemingway."

If cell phone novels are the new wave of the future one can only expect to see assigned homework through cell phones, seeing as how that would be the next logical step of progression.

This new cell phone novel concept has potential to spark great debate between the technology world and the literary world. According to one Chinese critic, Ye Yu, "As a linguistic art a novel is to be read, and through reading, you savor the characters and appreciate the atmosphere," according to the People's Daily, a news outlet for China. One of the many great things about reading a novel on your own is the capability to become completely engulfed in it. By having it available on your cell phone, it puts a limit on the amount of creativity that can be expressed because you're only able to read a limited amount of the story at a time.

If cell phone novels are the new wave of the future one can only expect to see assigned homework through cell phones, seeing as how that would be the next logical step of progression. And, if that truly is the path the future will be taking, there then presents the irony of how many professors disapprove of cell phone usage in class, yet it is that very tool that will enable us to access our nightly homework.

Cell phones are truly wonderful things with all the capabilities they now have. Through cell phones, one is able to check the scores of baseball games, the weather, and is even able to engage in online dating. They have made millions of lives easier in many ways and have truly expanded the way many people operate in their day-to-day lives. However, novels were meant to be bound and also readily available to the masses. Libraries were based off of being able to supply books to large amounts of people. By having them available on a cell phone, it would eliminate the step of going to a library and actually checking out one to read. While cell phones have their many helpful uses, reading novels on a digital screen should in no way replace bound books.

A lack of university spirit

Chris Eckel

The biggest problem facing UMass Amherst students today is...that it now costs $5.25 to go see a movie. I mean, c'mon, it's nice that the mall movie theater is about half as expensive as most movie theaters, but that price raise is hurting. How many of us have gotten up to the front of the line, with just a five-dollar bill, to be turned away like we were using a pitiful fake I.D. at Charlie's?

All right, so maybe we can deal with that rejection, but there is a bigger problem trickling through UMass. Something is sucking the spirit out of UMass students. Where's the pride that we attend the flagship public University of Massachusetts? It's no small deal to make it here, everyone put in good work to get in, and we should be proud of that. This place is one of the best public schools in the country, and a lot of people do not seem to care. You want proof that school spirit is fading?

Flip on ESPN Classic someday when old UMass basketball games from the Lou Roe and Marcus Camby era are playing. The Mullins Center is absolutely packed, and every student in there is going crazy. Nowadays, you can show up at halftime of the men's games and get a front row seat. It is pretty easy to point out the men's basketball team isn't playing solid basketball lately but what about all the UMass athletic teams that are playing well and high in the standings?

Get louder UMass but don't get as loud as the kid at the Lewis Black show. Being obnoxious isn't a substitute for school spirit.

Men's hockey, women's crew, and men's lacrosse all come to mind as teams that have been quite successful lately. The football team is ranked 14th in the country as I write this. The night game on Saturday was the most crowded I have ever seen, but who knows if it was just because it was a night game that allowed for plenty of tailgating. With the exception of hockey, which is finally getting some well-deserved fan support, most of these athletes play in front of small crowds. The athletes work too hard to play in front of empty bleachers.

It's not just the numbers that are pathetic, either. We are all college students. On one level, we're paying to go to classes and to live at UMass but let's face it, we all know we're basically buying four years of freedom to do whatever the hell we want, and we do. Riots, lounge wiffleball, Madden 2005 for 7 hours straight, frat parties, streaking in Northeast, way too much Antonio's at 2am, whatever it is you guys do when the weekend rolls around, UMass kids have a reputation for going all out for a good time. Let's keep that alive but at the same time, there's no reason we can't pour some of that energy into other things, like putting on a good show at the games.

It's pretty pathetic when the most visible basketball fan is the middle-aged guy who walks around with his signs. Hockey's been getting better, and by far has the best chants, but the star fan is the crazy old lady with her megaphone. Getting shown up at anything by someone four times our age is embarrassing. Get louder, UMass but don't get as loud as the kid at the Lewis Black show. Being obnoxious isn't a substitute for school spirit.

Of course, going to check out UMass athletics isn't the only way to show school spirit. The secret to sticking with a hobby is to find something you're passionate about. If you hate sports, then it's stupid to urge you to go to the Mullins Center. If writing is your thing, show up at the Collegian offices or write for one of the creative writing magazines on campus. If you like politics, look into the University Democrats, the Republican Club, or the International Relations club. If you directed the play in high school, then get over to the Fine Arts Center and give it a go.

Follow your passion, and the rest tends to fall into place. What you do isn't just going to reflect upon you, either. Sure, the best part about landing the part of Romeo in the fall play or running a national conference on student politics is calling home and your friends and bragging to them but there's more to the story than that. When UMass hosts a prestigious conference, or the political science honors fraternity wins national recognition, then the entire campus shines a bit brighter.

The reputation of this school goes up a notch, and that's something everyone who goes here can be proud of. The idea of bringing such a diverse crowd of people into UMass is that we all contribute in our own way. Live up to what you know you can do, and make this place a little better for all of us. And don't forget that extra quarter.

I consider myself an animal lover. Animals of all sizes and colors have always had a special place in my heart. I especially love cats and dogs. However, when I read that Stephens College in Columbia, Mo. was going to allow pets inside dormitories, I had my doubts. Specifically, the first floor of the college's Prunty Hall will allow dogs, cats and rabbits. Dogs can be no more than 40 pounds, and must be kept in crates or cages when the student leaves the room. There will be a fenced-in area outside of the hall for dogs to run free.

For the first semester, five students have chosen to take advantage of the new program. Stephens also is working with a local animal shelter to link select students with homeless pets, according to the Stephens College website. At first, I liked the idea of allowing pets in dorm rooms. I know all-too-well how hard it is to say goodbye to a pet when you go off to college. But when you move into a dorm room, it's a right of passage. In a way, You are leaving home, gaining independence, and separating yourself from your roots. I understand that students like to bring parts of home with them, such as pictures and knick-knacks (I'm guilty of this as well), but pets have always been something that should be left at home.

There are several other reasons why pets in dorm rooms are a bad idea. For one thing, the smell would get to be a problem after a very short time. There's nothing like coming home from class on a hot day and being greeted by a treat your cat has left for you. Even the people who live on the second floor of Prunty Hall will have to deal with the aroma coming up from below.

Some smells may be tough on the nose, but others would be tough for a different reason. The reason, of course, being allergies. Someone allergic to cat or dog hair wouldn't be able to even visit a friend on the first floor of Prunty Hall without sneezing up a storm, or worse. Another foreseeable problem is the noise. While the new plan at Stephens College does require the floor to be constantly inspected and evaluated, it would seem that on any given night a dog could start barking uncontrollably at a car parked out front, keeping everyone awake all night. Cats and rabbits make significantly less noise than dogs do, but they can scratch at the walls and cause serious damage to the furnishings. UMass has been known to charge students if the Ethernet box in their room gets dented… I can only imagine what would happen if a dog ripped in to the back of a chair cushion or a cat made a bed post his own personal claw-sharpener. Another problem could arise out of the requirement of students keeping the pets in crates or cages when they leave the room. I would barely have time to feed a fish or water a plant, given my busy schedule. Having the time to take full care of a cat or a dog would be inconceivable. And you know it would not take long for animal rights groups to take action of a pet is neglected due to a student simply not having the time to take care of it. I'll refrain from making any extended jokes about a student going into his Chem. 101 class and telling the professor, "Sorry, my dog ate my homework." Wendy Libby, president of Stephens College, was quoted on the school's website as saying, "We are a student-centered institution, and if having pets helps our Stephens students feel more at home and helps them excel, the program may be expanded." Expanded? Will the school start allowing pigs, monkeys and cobras into the dorms? College students have enough of a problem with noise and vandalism.

I understand that students like to bring parts of home with them, such as pictures and knick-knacks (I'm guilty of this as well), but pets have always been something that shouldd be left at home.

The last thing they need are wildlife creatures causing problems for them. Don't get me wrong: I would love to be able to have a pet up at school. If it were really that important to me, I'd wait until I could get an apartment (which, sadly, are mostly pet-free in the Amherst area anyway).

Perhaps, I'm a minority when it comes to this topic, but I consider pets as part of that group of things that are a part of your home life, and that should not come with you to college. You have to leave a part of you home when you move out, and while your favorite pet might be a big part of you, it's still a part that should stay behind.

'Wicker Park' gets grade

Hartnett and Byrne star in not-so-typical stalker flick

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Can there be such a thing as romantic stalking? In "Wicker Park" hardly a moment goes by without someone secretly slinking around on the heels of another person. Yet the movie isn't a twisted and deranged stalker nightmare a la "Fatal Attraction." "Single White Female" or the hundreds of bad Life-time movies about obsession made throughout the 1990s. The stalking in "Wicker Park" is more melancholy and sad; it has the clammy desperation of longing for someone both within and out of reach of those films, but it's tinged with a misty-eyed romanticism. Stalking in this world isn't scary or evil, but a natural extension of unrequited, unexpressed love.

'Wicker Park'
Directed by Paul McGuigan
Starring Josh Hartnett, Rose Byrne
MGM

Actually the love Matt (Josh Hartnett), a puppy-eyed investment banker from Chicago has for Lisa (Diane Kruger) isn't unrequited or unexpressed. The two used to be an item- he a shy photographer, she a lithe-bodied dancer (he met her by, get this, innocently following her around town) – but then, on the eve of his move to New York she disappears. Where did she go? Why did Lisa leave Matt, especially after he asked her to leave with him?

Cut to two years later, and Matt is back in town, working for the father of his new fiance. Dining out on the eve of a business trip to Shanghai, Matt thinks he spies Lisa. He proceeds to throw everything on the line to track her down. He sneaks into the woman's hotel room, and then her apartment to find out what happened. But is this woman really Lisa? What about the woman in the apartment (Rose Byrne) claiming to be Lisa?

Josh Hartnett and Diane Kruger embrace while taking a photograph in the erotic thriller 'Wicker Park,' directed by Paul McGuigan.

"Wicker Park" is a mind-twisting thriller that keeps going back and forth in time to answer the questions we probably already know the answers too. On that level, the movie probably can be considered a failure, but it's made in such a sexy and elegant way that the knotty twists and turns are still compelling. The director, Paul McGuigan, loads up the movie with a slew of visual tricks (blurred edges, freeze frames, split screens), but the results aren't stylish in a show-offy way; they threw the movie into a disorienting emotional undertow. It's like watching the very fragility of the characters being thrown right there on the screen.

The acting in "Wicker Park" is very good. I enjoyed Hartnett's cracking, boyish reticence; Byrne's doe-eyed angst and, especially, the performance of Matthew Lillard, who no longer coasts on his Matthew Lillard-ness in order to give a genuine performance of vulnerable bravado. I also loved the sleek soundtrack of hipster indie rock staples such as Death Cab for Cutie, Postal Service, and Mogwai. The movie isn't smart enough to convincingly pull the rug out from under us, and it stretches too much in the end to get to the requisite happy ending, but "Wicker Park" also manages to be an erotic thriller, with a genuine emotional pull.

New York Fashion Week 2004

A glance at the people, the parties and the designers

Style 101: your weekly guide to all things fashionable

By Monique Jemmott
Collegian Staff

Democrats have the DNC, athletes the Olympics, and the best to ever do it in fashion? Well, they have fashion week, a glorious five days that explore, discover, and pay tribute to the art and elements of fashion; and what better place to kick off the series of fashion weeks across the globe than the worlds most stylish city?

New York Fashion Week 2004, sponsored by the likes of Mercedes-Benz, the New York Times, Olympus, and W Hotels, has been the height of anticipation all year for industry moguls, fashion forward celebrities and fashionistas alike for first glance at the direction of fashion for the spring/summer 2005 season.

And what a wait it was. With over 80 designers participating in the week's festivities, Manhattan's Bryant Park has been transformed into the IN crowds wonderland, complete with outdoor runways, celebrity sightings, and THE most posh parties. Attendance to New York's fashion week is invitation only, and not open to the public so people like us can only imagine and dream of what takes place on the other side of the gates.

The runway shows, although the main event, are not the only things to look forward to. The parties are also another major component to any fashion week. Some of the most anticipated parties of the week were the grand opening celebration of P Diddy's Sean Jean flagship store on 41st and Fifth Avenue in Manhattan, and the return of the Emilio Pucci Flagship store on Fifth Avenue has also been generating buzz amongst fashion week participants.

Highlights from Bryant Park's trendiest runways

By Samantha Critchell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Zac Posen, winner of this year's award for emerging talent from the Council of Fashion Designers of America, offered a futuristic look for spring 2005.

His filled-to-capacity runway show Friday night included a dark gray stud dress, a black spider-web gown and an orange fantail raincoat. Most of the garments hugged the body, a departure from the looser silhouettes so prevalent during the first half of an eight-day schedule of designer shows at New York Fashion Week.

Posen offered three distinct groups of designs. One blended several bold patterns pop-art flowers, argyle and stripes in bold colors such as yellow, green and orange; another was his edgy version of the nautical look, including a metallic embroidered cable skirt and a pair of tight sailor pants paired with a Nehru jacket; and a third was Barbarella meets Catwoman.

There wasn't one outfit in his show that could have come from the Moroccan marketplace that inspired designers such as Carolina Herrera, Cynthia Steffe and Nicole Miller at their spring previews earlier in the week. Highlights of his collection included a dress that shimmered with argyle diamonds of purple, gold and silver beads with a fringe hemline and a black gown with peek-aboo tiers.

Lesley Jane Seymour, editor-in-chief of Marie Claire, said she preferred Posen's simpler fitted shapes over the flamboyant gowns with long trains that closed his show.

Event

The Stonewall Center, located in the Southwest Residential Area on the University of Massachusetts campus, will hold an open house today, between 3 and 5 p.m.; all are welcome to come check out the university's lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender resource venue. Attendees are encouraged to peruse the book and video library, find out about future happenings, and mingle. The reception will be held in Crampton Hall.

Lecture

Jones Library, in Amherst, will host the first of a four-part series titled "Understanding Islam" tonight at 7 p.m. Tonight's talk will focus specifically on Muhammed and the Koran and will feature a brief lecture from the University of Massachusetts' own Professor Mary Wilson, director of Middle East Studies. For more information contact Adult Services Libranan Beth Girshman at 256-4090.

ThursdaySeptember16

Music

Local groove heroes Cold Duck Complex will spread their funky, hip-hop gospel all over western Massachusetts this week with two scheduled area performances. On Thursday, the Duck throws down in Springfield, at the Alumni Club; bring your ID (this show is 21+). On Friday, you can catch Amherst's finest at the Shutesbury Athletic Club for an all-ages romp; admission is $5. For more information, check out www.coldduck-complex.com.

FridaySeptember17

Music

Amherst's own The Loose Goose cafe hosts local tenor saxophonist Lena Bloch tonight at 8:30 p.m. Along with bassist Dave Picchi and drummer Rory O'Connor Bloch will play both original compositions and the works of Thelonious Monk. The show is free and open to all.

Tonight Mount Holyoke College's outdoor Gettel Amphitheater will host folk-rocker Erin McKeown. Fresh off a summer tour that included pit-stops at the Appel Farm Arts & Music Festival in New Jersey and the prestigious Bonnaroo Music Festival in Tennessee, McKeown is no stranger to the stage; this weekend, she brings her killer live show to the Pioneer Valley for an evening of acoustic adventures beneath the stars (for free!). McKeown kicks it off at 6:30 p.m.

Sound Tribe Sector Nine will bring their hypnotic trance-funk back to Northampton's Pearl Street Night Club for a reprise of their legendary gig last April tonight. Combining the best elements of jam-rock and DJ Culture, Sound Tribe delivers an eclectic mix of sounds that, in theory, might not gel (Phish plays a rave?). But that's exactly why you'll go: you've got to hear it to believe it. Tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door; the Tribe hits at 8:30 p.m.

Art

Artist Jaume Plensa will appear at the University Gallery at the University of Massachusetts today with a reception running from 5-7 p.m. An exhibition of his work, entitled "Silent Noise," will open at the gallery on Saturday. Hailing from Barcelona, Plensa has allowed for thirteen sculptures and several paper works to travel the U.S., culminating in a respite at the UMass. The exhibition runs through December 12. Sat. Sept. 18

The Californians will share the stage with Maxxtone and Thirtystones. Tickets are $20 at www.iheg.com or $23 at the door. Proceeds benefit RAINN. The music starts at 7 p.m.

Recap of New York Fashion Week

STYLE 101 from page 8

Fashion week has been the grounding for many designers in the industry catapulting them to the crème de la crème of ready to wear, couture and everything in between. Examples of this can be seen in design team Imitation of Christ who were amongst this years featured shows. Other featured designers include Carolina Herrera, Tommy Hilfiger, Vera Wang, Baby Phat, Sean John, Marc Jacobs, and the fashion world's new golden boy Zac Posen.

And oh the celebrities you will see at any Fashion week. Celebs from all ends of the spectrum can be spotted here, whether they are there for business, pleasure or for the sheer thrill of the fashion scene. So far amongst the fiends to be seen have been the Hilton Sisters, the OC's Mishca Barton, Ludacris, Al and Tiper Gore, and Ivana Trump.

At the close of this momentous event, (which goes on until this Wednesday) will be the official stylebook for the upcoming seasons, complete with the looks, colors and accessories that will be popping up all over the place before you know it. So get out a pen and paper children, and begin your wish list for Santa a little early this year:

Bold bright colors will make a return to this springs wardrobe, but some colors have been done away with. Just as pink made its insurgence last season, and became the new black it is time to catalog those rosy hues in your closet for this spring (trust me, they will come back) and go green, green is the new pink. Wear it everywhere, jackets, handbags, makeup, etc. This trend will also be huge for the guys, along with bold prints on pants, and jackets seen in both Zac Posen, and Sean John's spring lines.

Demure dresses also flooded the scene from designers such as Vera Wang and Monique Lhuillier. The evening dresses have gone from sleek and sexy, to flowy and pretty. Put your good girl side in these, and be as bad as you want.

"I thought he was trying a little too hard with those big parachutes, but the colors were great, and he's going to sell a gazillion of those sheer T-shirts he had with the skirts and pants," Seymour told The Associated Press. "I like when he's modern and functional."

Tennis star Serena Williams took several pictures of styles with her digital camera from her vantage point on the front row. She was seated near actress Claire Danes and model/socialite/reality TV star Paris Hilton.

Earlier in the day, Monique Lhuillier's show attracted Nicole Richie, Hilton's "The Simple Life" co-star; Famke Janssen of the "X-Men" films; and Nia Vardalos of "My Big Fat Greek Wedding."

Perhaps they were looking for something to wear on the red carpet. Lhuillier, who began as a bridal-gown designer, has become popular with young Hollywood stars.

Her spring preview included a chiffon gown in a delicate sage floral print and two teal chiffon gowns, one with a keyhole top, pleated bust and beaded neckline, the other featuring an illusion neckline.

The Los Angeles-based designer, making her fourth appearance at the New York shows, also offered daytime outfits, include a belted white linen military jacket with white linen Bermuda shorts and a Chantilly lace-ruffle wrap blouse, a V-neck cashmere sweater and a slip skirt in various shades of yellow.

New York Fashion Week continues through Wednesday at the tents in Bryant Park and other venues throughout the city, with Ralph Lauren, Michael Kors, Marc Jacobs, Anna Sui and Betsey Johnson still to come.

Paul Revere:

Art exhibit pays tribute to a historic icon

By RANDALL CHASE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHADDS FORD, Pa. — Listen my children and you shall hear, that Longfellow's poem about Paul Revere. While inspiring dozens of artists whose works you can see, historically is not all that it's cracked up to be.

Fortunately, the Brandywine River Museum is helping to set the record straight in a new exhibit titled "Revere's Ride and Longfellow's Legend."

The exhibit features more than 50 works by artists and illustrators such as William Robinson Leigh, N.C. Wyeth, Howard Pyle, Leonard Everett Fisher and Charles Santore.

The works run the stylistic gamut from romanticism to realism, and include even parody. A 1977 comic strip from "Peanuts" creator Charles Schultz, for example, portrays Linus and Snoopy rehearsing a Revere-like heralding of the Great Pumpkin's approach.

Through paintings, drawings, illustrations and other media, the exhibit explores the variety of ways Revere has been portrayed, and sometimes lampooned, throughout history. It also examines the inspiration for those images, whether it be historical fact or, as was often the case, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's classic ode, "Paul Revere's Ride."

"People have tended to assume that Longfellow was being historically accurate," said Virginia O'Hara, associate curator for the Brandywine museum. " ... The poem certainly has value, but we're trying, as historians have been doing for some time, to try to set the record straight."

For example, contrary to the perception that might be drawn from Longfellow, Revere was not the sole rider spreading the alarm on the night of April 18, 1775. He was a member of a well-organized network of patriots that had been monitoring British troop movements and efforts to seize American munitions caches.

"He wasn't an isolated hero, as the poem may suggest," O'Hara said.

Nor did Revere arrive in Concord, Mass., "at two by the village clock," having been stopped by a British patrol after leaving Lexington. Revere's fellow riders, William Dawes and Samuel Prescott, managed to escape the British patrol, and Prescott, whom the other two happened upon along the way, was the only one who made it to Concord.

Longfellow's most glaring error, however, is his description of Revere, "impatient to mount and ride," anxiously watching the tower of Christ Church to learn whether British troops stationed in Boston were crossing the Charles River by boat on their way to arrest Samuel Adams and John Hancock in Lexington, or marching by land across Boston Neck.

In fact, fearing that he might not be able to cross the river from Boston to Charlestown and ride on to alert the countryside and warn Adams and Hancock, Revere made signal arrangements ahead of time with the church rector. When Revere learned of the British plan, he instructed the rector to show two lanterns to warn fellow patriots that the Redcoats were making a river crossing before marching north.

"The biggest inaccuracy in the poem is the lantern story," said Edith Steblecki, curator of the Paul Revere Memorial Association in Boston, which assisted O'Hara and contributed several items to the exhibit. "Longfellow has it as a signal to Revere, and it was actually a signal from Revere."

The exhibit opens with a brief introduction to Long-fellow, who some believe was less concerned about the historical accuracy of his poem than in trying to find a way to draw the attention of Americans to the drumbeat of another war that was growing louder in April 1860, when he began writing his poem after a visit to Christ Church.

"It was likely he was looking at Revere as sort of a symbol of unity and looking back in America's past for inspiration," Steblecki said.

From Longfellow, the exhibit turns to Revere himself, offering examples of his engravings and silver work and descriptions of his political activities in the years leading up to war. A look at the man is followed by depictions of his famous ride and the ensuing battles of Lexington and Concord, including two 1775 engravings by Amos Doolittle.

Perhaps the most visually striking image in the exhibit is Leigh's "Midnight Ride of Paul Revere," (1917), a shadowy, dramatic portrayal of both rider and horse that graces a 24-page booklet accompanying the exhibit.

From historical depictions of Revere, the exhibit turns to his impact on popular culture over more than two centuries.

That impact ranges from a 1914 Thomas Edison film to amusing children's tales, such as Robert Lawson's "Mr. Revere and I," told from the horse's perspective, and finally to crass commercialism.

"Paul Revere made history that night," a bourbon whiskey ad from the early 20th century proudly proclaims. "During that same generation the family of James E. Pepper founded its distillery."

The impetus for the exhibit was a conversation that O'Hara had a few years ago with Philadelphia illustrator Santore, who at the time was illustrating a new version of Longfellow's poem, published last year by HarperCollins.

Several of Santore's illustrations are included in the exhibit, and he is scheduled to appear at a book signing Nov. 13.

The exhibit opened Saturday and runs through Nov. 21, after which it will travel to the National Heritage Museum in Lexington, Mass., for a six-month run beginning Jan. 29.

Venice Film Festival recognizes Europe's independent filmmakers

Director Mike Leigh receives top honors for 'Vera Drake' at one of Italy's premiere events

VENICE, Italy — Mike Leigh's "Vera Drake," a film about an underground abortionist in 1950s England, won the Golden Lion for best picture Saturday at the close of the 11-day Venice Film Festival.

"Vera Drake" is another of Leigh's raw, naturalistic films dealing with social issues in Britain. This time the setting is London of half a century ago, where a seemingly unexceptional housewife is secretly performing abortions.

"In a cynical world, it is a wonderful thing and most reassuring when low-budget, serious, committed, independent, Euro-pean films are recognized and encouraged in this way and helped to reach their audiences," Leigh told the awards gala at central Venice's Fenice theater.

Leigh, 61, is famous for drawing out stunning performances from his actors, and this time was no different, with Imelda Staunton taking best actress for her role as Drake.

"I do think it deals with a complex subject with such compassion," she told the audience. "Mike Leigh is a genius."

Leigh is known for disturbing and emotional films such "Secrets and Lies" (1996) and "Naked" (1992). His intense approach often requires months of working on character development with the actors.

The runner-up of the night was the Spanish film "Mar Adentro" ("The Sea Within"), by "The Others" director Alejandro Amenabar. The film had been touted as a possible best-picture winner, but instead it took home the Silver Lion Jury Grand Prix. Star Javier Bardem won best actor for his role as a quadriplegic man who wants to end his life.

The Silver Lion for best director went to Korean director Kim Ki-duk for "Bin jip."

Some 22 films were in competition for the Golden Lion awards. The nine-person jury was headed by British director John Boorman and included filmmaker Spike Lee.

This year's festival was notable for its shaky organization, and the awards ceremony preserved the trend.

The presenter, Italian actress Claudia Gerini, initially handed Amenabar a Silver Lion, then announced it was time for the big one: the Golden Lion for best picture. However, she'd left out the Silver Lion for Kim, and suddenly it was unclear who had won what.

"Sorry, I missed a prize," she said with embarrassment. "We haven't arrived at the Golden Lion."

The most common complaint during the festival was that screenings started late — sometimes by over an hour.

A late-night presentation of Johnny Depp's "Finding Neverland" didn't begin until after 2 a.m. Another long delay preceded Al Pacino's "The Merchant of Venice." Then it turned out that overbooking had left the actor without a seat. And part way through a screening of the film "Eros," the projectionist mistakenly began showing a different film.

That said, the festival had high points, most visibly its flood of Hollywood stars.

The show began Sept. 1 when Steven Spielberg and Tom Hanks turned up for the opening-gala screening of "The Terminal." Other stars present included Nicole Kidman, John Travolta, Will Smith, Robert De Niro, Quentin Tarantino and Angelina Jolie.

And Saturday night was a time to celebrate.

No one did so more electrically than 80-year-old "Singin' in the Rain" co-director Stanley Donen. He was awarded a lifetime achievement award and, on the prodding of hostess Sophia Loren, did a nimble dance routine across the stage.

"I had a great life. I made a lot of movies," Donen said. "It's not over yet. I'm gonna do some more. And I'm just thrilled to be here."

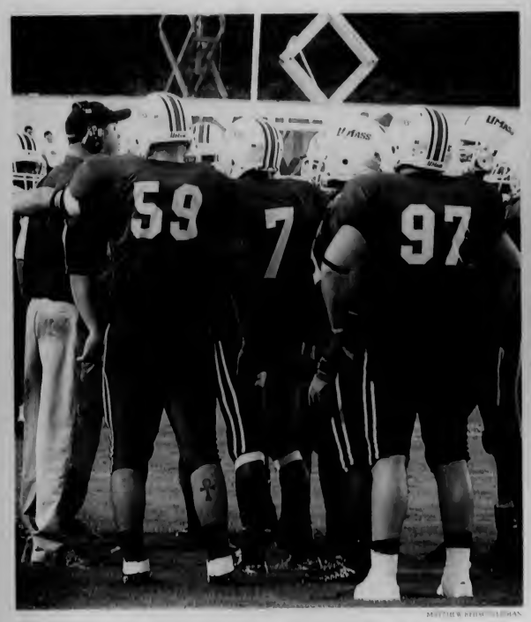
For one night, UMass was a football school. It wasn't a basketball school or a hockey school. The gridiron at McGuirk had a special glow about it that hadn't been noticeable in decades.

The crowd was officially a factor after Steve Baylark's first touchdown run of the first quarter. Following the celebration in the end zone, wide receiver Brandon London ran off the field with his arms flailing at the crowd challenging it to get louder, and the home fans responded.



The crowd wasn't just yelling during game action, either. At halftime, the Maroon Platoon heckled Colgate kicker Lane Schwarzberg after he missed a field goal attempt during warm-ups.

The Massachusetts fans didn't disperse until midway through the fourth quarter when the Minutemen had the game well in hand with a 30-13 lead.

When UMass takes the field this Saturday afternoon at 1 p.m. against Richmond in its Atlantic-10 opener, the crowd will certainly be smaller than the one against Colgate. The atmosphere won't be as crazy as a SPIRE meltdown, and the lights will have long since been shipped out.

The university got it right by scheduling a night game this season, and they have the numbers to prove it: 30-20 and 16,405. Hopefully, this time, it doesn't take them another four years to bring the lights back.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist.

quarter, but Peebler added to the Minutemen's advantage when he took a third down screen pass from Day and scampered 58 yards for his second touchdown to push the advantage to 30-13 with 14:45 to play in the game.

Colgate then returned the favor, but became its own enemy in the process, using 8:30 to march 80 yards before Branch plunged in from a yard out to narrow the margin to 30-20 with 6:15 remaining.

The Maroon and White got out of the gates running in the first quarter. Baylark capped a seven-play, 57-yard drive when he found the end zone from 32 yards out to give UMass a 7-0 lead just over 11 minutes into the game.

The Apopka, Fla. native then followed that up with a 13-yard touchdown scamper just before the start of the second quarter to make the score 14-0.

The Raiders did not go away, however, as Dick Biddle's squad came up with 10 consecutive points to tighten things up. A Lane Schwarzburg 21-yard field goal with just over two minutes to play in the half made the score 14-3, and after UMass sophomore wide receiver Brandon London lost a fumble on the ensuing kickoff, the Raiders narrowed the gap even further.

Taking over at the Minutemen's 42-yard line, Brown needed only four plays to find senior wideout Luke Graham with a 31-yard touchdown pass.

UMass continues to struggle in dropping third straight their game in the second half, and they are a good enough team to make you pay."

Chad Mongeon and Burns each made four saves for their respected teams after facing a combined 23 shots. UMass out cornered Maine 5-1 but failed to capitalize on any of its eight free shots.

Maine tacked on an insurance goal with 10:15 left in regulation to ensure victory. The goal was scored by Joe Corey and assisted by Gabriel Germano.

"This is a very young team that has worked hard and is getting used to the college pace," Koch said. "We didn't win the 50-50's and weren't allowed many second chances. You can't win if you get beaten to the ball."

The loss of three All-Americans to graduation last season may be contributing to UMass' early season scoring woes. Burns and midfielder/forward Gabe Barard are the team's only seniors. Seventeen freshman and sophomores comprise the bulk of the Massachusetts squad.

The Maroon and White will return to action on Tuesday at 3:30 when they will be looking for their first victory of the season against Hartford at Rudd Field.

Red Sox fall to Mariners

By Tim Korte
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE – Gil Meche pitched a five-hitter for his second career shutout and Raul Ibanez hit a two-run homer to lead the Seattle Mariners over the Boston Red Sox 2-0 Sunday.

Shut out for the third time this season, Boston fell 3 1/2 games behind the first-place New York Yankees in the AL East. The Red Sox have a five-game lead over Anaheim in the wild-card race.

Seattle's Ichiro Suzuki went 2-for-4 with singles in the first and eighth, boosting his total to 231 hits this season. With 20 games remaining, Suzuki is batting .374 and needs 27 hits to break the 84-year-old major league record of 257 by George Sisler of the St. Louis Browns.

Meche (5-6) walked one, struck out four and retired 12 of his final 13 batters in his third career complete game. This was the first time he pitched nine innings – the other two games were shortened to five innings because of rain. His other shutout was a five-inning one-hitter in a 7-0 victory over Kansas City on June 13, 2000.

Meche was 1-5 with a 7.06 ERA before being demoted to Triple-A Tacoma on June 2. In nine starts since being recalled July 30, he's 4-1 with a 3.45 ERA. He has also won four of his last five decisions.

The teams split four games, ending Boston's streak of seven straight series victories. The Red Sox came into Sunday as the highest-scoring team in the majors with 825 runs.

Derek Lowe (14-11) had a solid duel with Meche but was denied in his bid for a third straight 15-win season. He pitched seven innings, allowing two runs on five hits with six strikeouts and one walk.

Ibanez put the Mariners up 2-0 in the sixth, driving a 2-0 pitch from Lowe an estimated 408 feet into the center-field stands. Edgar Martinez was on base after a two-out single.

After issuing a full-count walk to Johnny Damon leading off the sixth, Meche gave up a single to Orlando Cabrera to put runners at the corners.

But Meche kept his cool, getting Manny Ramirez on a first-pitch liner to a leaping Bret Boone at second base. Meche then struck out Jason Varitek and retired Kevin Millar on a foul popup.

Meche shut down the Red Sox again in the seventh. After Trot Nixon's leadoff single, he got Bill Mueller to fly to center, struck out David McCarty and retired pinch-hitter David Ortiz on a liner to third.

Notes: Damon has reached base safely in 22 straight games. ... University of Washington basketball standout Nate Robinson threw out the ceremonial first pitch. Seconds later, C Dan Wilson brought out Seattle's lineup card. ... Seattle LF Randy Winn made a nice catch on a deep fly by Varitek in the fourth, nearly losing the ball in the sun.

Another tough loss

Minutewomen drop close game to UNH

By Brendan Hall
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Call it what you will, the Massachusetts women's soccer team is falling into a rhythm. A rhythm, that is, of falling just a little bit too short.

First there were a score of injuries. Then came a tough loss, followed by another string of injuries. You can probably guess what happened Saturday in Durham, N.H., taking on the New Hampshire Wildcats (2-2-2) in what UMass coach Jim Rudy considered one of the most intense halves he has ever witnessed in his career.

With just under 13 minutes remaining in regulation, Wildcats sophomore Kelly Collins put forth a thru-ball that sliced right through the midfield to an area just outside the penalty box, where freshman Kaitlyn Serrafine trapped it.

When Minutewomen goalkeeper Kristin Walker charged out too far, Serrafine tipped it right over Walker to make what was a neck-and-neck game a 1-0 loss for UMass.

"They got at us," Rudy said. "We just weren't following through out there. This was a heartbreaker for us. We kept coming close, but we just couldn't get it in.

"Right now, we're in the mode of almost. Again, we're going to have to be patient, but we don't want to wait until the second season [Atlantic 10 Conference play]. We're going to keep training hard. Something will break soon."

The Minutewomen (0-4-1) headed home empty-handed in the loss column, but showed some signs of improvement along the defensive side.

"I thought [redshirt-freshman] Stephanie Barrett did a great job defending [UNH's] Chiara Best," Rudy said. Barrett, however, had to cease her defending of the Wildcats' second-leading scorer midway through the second half, when she was cracked on the knee. Rudy suggests it may be a bruise, but nonetheless the game ran a little differently in the following minutes.

"That right there, that really changed the flow of the game," Rudy said.

The collision brought back memories of last year's match between these two teams, a very physical battle in which the Minutewomen went home with a loss and without four of its players.

The referees were very lenient then, letting a lot of fouls go uncalled, but the atmosphere was a bit different this time around. It was a physical battle in a way that didn't need injuries to occur.

"The officiating was a lot better," Rudy said. "They called a lot of touch fouls. It doesn't take a lot to please me, because I know how hard it is to referee a game, but I thought they did a good job."

Playing without leading scorer Jackie Wishoski, who was recently hurt in a car crash, the Wildcats came out in the first half with a great fire and determination. But at the same time, the Minutewomen were able to keep pace because of their exposure of UNH's biggest weakness: the right flank.

"They did good around the corners," Rudy said. "We did our flank breaks a lot better, and they fought pretty hard. I said whoever gets the first goal would win this one, and that's exactly what happened."

Freshman Britt Canfield was the first to break through the Wildcats' right flank at the 25th minute of the first half, cruising her way through to set up Stormy Fairweather's shot that went just wide.

Canfield then broke the flank again four minutes later at the 21-minute mark, this time taking the shot herself, but again the Maroon and White's efforts went sailing wide.

UMass had one last corner kick before the half ended, but it was wrestled away by Wildcats goalkeeper Liz Mackay.

The Minutewomen encountered their first sign of treachery with about ten minutes to go in the first half. After a long pass from senior Jacquelyn Kendall, Best turned on the jets and worked through the heart of the UMass defense with some ankle-breaking finesse. She then cut straight out to the middle of the field, where her shot was turned away by a rushing Walker.

Best was present yet again early in the second. Embarking on a huge breakaway, the junior went to make a move in the one-on-one battle with Walker, but Walker grabbed the ball away before she could get her shot off. Several minutes later, Serrafine sent a through pass to Best, but she was thwarted again when her shot was turned away at the near post.

Canfield broke the right flank minutes later, and passed the ball off to Adair Blyler. She, like Best, was turned away.

After Serrafine's chip shot, the Maroon and White made a last-ditch effort that would come up just short. With five minutes to go, the Wildcats got called on a crucial foul 40 yards from the goal near the right touch line.

But when Lindsay Bellini sent her shot airborne, Mackay quickly pounced on it to end the drive.

UMass had one last chance with 2:40 to go. Freshman Jenny Roehrig approached along the left side with some nice dribbling, but her shot sailed wide right.

UMass exacts revenge on Colgate under the lights

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

You know what they say about payback.

Just shy of 10 months after the Massachusetts football team saw its 2003 season come to a bitter end on the snow-covered turf of Andy Kerr Stadium, the Minutemen finally had their crack at the Colgate Red Raiders on a clear and even playing field, and the results were distinctly different than the 19-7 loss that bounced UMass from the Division I-AA playoffs.

Colgate	20

With a raucous crowd of 16,405 – the largest to watch a football game on the UMass campus in 30 years – nearly filling Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the university's second-ever night game, the 14th-ranked Minutemen scored the game's first two touchdowns and never looked back, shutting down No. 4 Colgate 30-20 to improve to 2-0 under new coach Don Brown.

"I would be remiss if I didn't tell you our guys were looking forward to this one," UMass (2-0) head coach Don Brown said. "From the day I was hired we had this one circled on the calendar.

"I told the guys that I was going to have them ready and prepared to play. We went out and had a great week of preparation and we came out and played at a very high level tonight and did what we wanted to do.

"Every time they delivered a blow, we hung in there and delivered a counter blow."

"It had nothing to do with last season," Colgate coach Dick Biddle said. "I'm sure they (UMass) were using it as motivation, but we just got beat."

"UMass was obviously motivated, but we hung in there."

Wide receiver Jason Peebler was once again the offensive star for the Maroon and White, catching four passes for 161 yards and two touchdowns, including a highlight reel run-after-the-catch on a 58 yard scoring strike in the fourth quarter.

The senior is now third all-time in career receiving yards at UMass with 1,624 and ninth overall in career receptions with 84. When asked if he felt the results of Saturday night's game should have taken the place of what transpired back in November, UMass' captain did not hesitate.

"Definitely. We have a better team, a better coach, better schemes and better players. We showed that tonight."

Junior tailback Steve Baylark also had a banner day for the Minutemen, carrying 18 times for 124 yards and two touchdowns in outgaining the 'Gate's Walter Payton Award winner Jamaal Branch for the second time in as many meetings.

After being held to just 59 yards in the previous meeting between the two teams, Branch again struggled against the Minutemen in picking up just 62 yards on 23 carries.

With their running game being rendered ineffective, the Raiders were thus forced to go to the air. Senior quarterback Chris Brown completed 27-of-48 passes for 272 yards and a touchdown, but was intercepted three times.

On the other side, UMass junior quarterback Tim Day was 13-of-22 for 258 yards and a pair of touchdowns, and was intercepted twice.

Leading 17-10 at the start of the second half, UMass took control of the game for good on its second possession when Day hit Peebler with a 50-yard touchdown pass that made the score 23-10 following a botched extra point.

The Red Raiders answered back with a field goal to cut the lead to 23-13 at the 2:20 mark of the third

Night done right

Massachusetts' football fans were treated to something a little out of the ordinary on Saturday night: a legitimate college football atmosphere.

No, McGuirk Stadium wouldn't come close in comparison to the crowds that come out in counties to see games at the Big House or the Swamp, but football hasn't exactly been a life or death matter in Amherst for a considerable amount of time now.

Jeff Howe

Just don't tell that to the crowd of 16,405 people who attended Saturday night's slugfest between the Minutemen and the Colgate Red Raiders, which was, in fact, the largest crowd at McGuirk Stadium in 30 years.

The fans were a big reason that No. 14 UMass was able to knock off No. 4 Colgate by a score of 30-20. They cheered for each positive play, booed at every botched penalty call and taunted the Colgate players for their mis-cues. And, believe me, there was plenty of each to go around.

The Minutemen didn't need an added incentive to come out fired up on Saturday, but what player on any team doesn't love performing in front of a huge crowd that is largely in their favor?

This was the rematch of last year's NCAA Division I-AA first round playoff game won by Colgate 19-7; a score that UMass players didn't feel justified who exactly was the better team last season.

This was a game that was circled by UMass Coach Don Brown as soon as he took over the position in February. When wide receiver Jason Peebler was asked about the Colgate game nearly three weeks ago, he immediately got goose bumps, and the hair on his arms stood straight up.

The Maroon and White had its chance at revenge and, thanks to a brilliant idea by Massachusetts Athletic Director John McCutcheon, the game was played under the lights for the second time in school history – the only other time being the home opener against William & Mary in 2000.

All of these ingredients added up to one amazing football experience, both before and during the game. And don't forget about the fireworks display after.

People from both schools were out in groves tailgating early Saturday afternoon down by the stadium. They were wearing their school colors with true pride and hollering back and forth at each other with enough intensity to match a Howard Dean speech.

Payton Award winner doesn't measure up against Minutemen

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Sometimes the best just isn't good enough, and in the case of Colgate tailback Jamaal Branch, sometimes the best just isn't the best.

The Mashpee native and former Falmouth High School star had a fantastic season for the Red Raiders in 2003, setting single-season I-AA records for rushing yards (2,326), carries (450), touchdowns (29) and 100-yard games (12) in being named the recipient of the Walter Payton Award as the top offensive player in Division I-AA. Yet the staff, supporters and members of the Massachusetts football team have to be wondering if the 6-foot 225-pounder is the real deal.

Twice now Branch has taken the field against the Minutemen in big games, and twice he has failed to impress. On the frozen tundra of Andy Kerr Stadium during the I-AA playoffs back in November, the big man gained just 59 yards sloshing through drifts of snow and huge clods of frozen mud. Colgate supporters blamed it on the weather, but UMass junior Steve Baylark waddled through the same slop and finished with 84 yards.

Saturday night, on a clean field and under a beautiful, moonlit sky Branch finished with a paltry 62 yards on 23 carries — a 2.7 yards-per-carry average. His long run of the night was 10 yards.

Obviously, the truth lies somewhere in between what Branch accomplished throughout most of last season and what he's done against the Maroon and White. Playing against Ivy League schools and those within the confines of the non-scholarship Patriot League last season, Branch shined. However against teams outside the league he was less than stellar.

After being held in check by the Minutemen, Branch again gained just 69 yards on 22 carries the following week in a 28-27 win over Western Illinois. His long that afternoon was just 13 yards to go along with just 2.5 yards-per-carry, and in similar fashion to the week before, his counterpart Travis Glasford picked up 85 yards on 18 carries in the same snow and mud.

The next week was strikingly different for Branch, as he amassed a more impressive 148 yards against Florida Atlantic on a clean field. However he did so on a whopping 48 carries, and with a long run of 14 yards. In addition, his yards-per-carry average that afternoon was just 2.9.

Finally, the night after being honored with the Payton Award, Branch accentuated his mediocrity against scholarship schools. Facing eventual national champion Delaware, who shared the Atlantic 10 Conference championship with UMass, Branch carried 20 times for 58 yards and did not find the end zone. His long rush of that evening was a paltry eight yards and his average rush was again less than impressive, at 2.8 yards per carry.

In comparison, the Blue Hens ran for 197 total yards that evening. Branch's total yards were eclipsed by UD tailback Germaine Bennett's, and he came within seven total yards of being equaled not only by Delaware's second back, Antawn Jenkins, but also by quarterback Andy Hall.

So while No. 25 remains on the Payton Award's "watch list", and will surely enjoy another fine campaign in his last year in Hamilton, the truth may finally be out.

"I don't think he's the best back in the nation," Baylark said. "I know that if I keep working hard and stay focused, I can get to that level.

"I can be better than him."

UM can't Bear down, loses third straight

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

Jimmy Velas scored the first two goals of his eight-day-old collegiate career Saturday in a 3-1 Maine victory over Massachusetts in men's soccer.

The freshman midfielder notched a pair of goals in less than six minutes to give the Black Bears (1-1-1) their first victory of the season. The homecoming loss drops UMass to an 0-3 record.

The action was fairly even throughout the first half with the only converted scoring chance going in favor of Massachusetts. UMass freshman Matty Lemire capitalized on a centering feed from fellow midfielder Michael Donnelly with 4:42 remaining in the first frame.

Donnelly found a seam in the Maine defense after gaining control of a loose ball deep in Black Bear territory. Donnelly's pass to Lemire set up a shot that beat Maine goalkeeper Chad Mongeon to the lower left corner of the net. The goal gave the Maroon and White its first lead of the season, which it maintained until the second half.

Lemire's goal is only UMass' second of the season, as the Minutemen have been outscored 9-2 by opponents thus far.

"(Lemire) has been training hard and I expect many more [goals] from him and the other five freshman we have playing," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We had our scoring chances just like Maine, but they scored and we didn't."

As the second half got underway, Maine soon found itself with a golden scoring opportunity. A series of perimeter passes by the Black Bears in its offensive zone drew the UMass defense out to pressure the ball. But before the Massachusetts defense could set, Justin Stockford fired an outside shot towards the goal.

Stockford's shot ricocheted off the right goalpost, landing in open space a few feet from the goal. UMass net minder Colin Burns charged out of the goal but was beaten to the loose ball by Velas, who scored an uncontested goal at 53:59. Stockford was credited with the assist.

After tying the game at one goal apiece, Velas caught another break that helped elevate Maine to a 2-1 advantage, with 30:41 left to play. The scoring chance came about when Matthew Bernal of Maine lobbed a breakaway pass into the offensive zone.

The streaking Velas caught up to the ball a split-second before Burns and managed to bounce a shot off the diving goalkeeper. Burns, who had run twenty feet out of the net to grab the loose ball, was caught out of position and didn't have time to recover. The deflected shot bounced off Burns towards the UMass goal, where it was recovered by Velas, who dribbled towards the net unabated. The assist was attributed to Bernal.

"We gave too much space in midfield and were beaten to loose balls," Koch said. "We let Maine play

Adaptive Use Bridge Project gives old bridges a new home

By Allie Bahn
Collegian Correspondent

By the end of the fall, the University of Massachusetts campus will have two pieces of history connecting walkways for campus pedestrians.

The, "Adaptive Use Bridge Project" is an on-campus program where engineering students learn how to move and refurbish truss bridges from different locations in New England. The bridges are then reconstructed as part of the landscape to improve pedestrian paths around campus.

Dr. Alan J. Lutenegger, a professor and department head of the College of Engineering at UMass started the program in the fall of 2001. It is the only program of its kind in the country to date.

The goal of the project is to restore five to six of the iron and steel truss bridges, while giving engineering students hands-on experience.

"We want to preserve engineering history, we want students to have the opportunity to do something meaningful for civil engineering, and we want to enhance the campus by putting up bridges for pedestrians," said Lutenegger.

Truss bridges, commonly found in Western Massachusetts, are usually one lane, small bridges that run across rivers and streams. They have characteristic "X" structures, which are made from links and are connected by joints.

The 42-foot long steel 1906 Warren Truss Pony Bridge will be the first bridge brought to campus, and will be placed between the trees by the North end of the McGuirk Alumni Football stadium parking lot. The bridge is originally from Vermont.

"We had to piece it all back together," said Lutenegger. The bridge has since been cleaned and re-painted a burgundy color in honor of it's new home and is projected to be in place by October 1.

"It's great that he [Lutenegger] can find a project that people can volunteer to do and not only is it beneficial to us [engineering students], but also to people on campus," said Michael Goodman, a senior and civil engineering student. Goodman spent his summer interning with Dr. Lutenegger refurbishing old bridges and testing pieces of the structures in labs.

"We are doing a lot of lab work, and a lot of comparisons and seeing the strength of the old bridges," said Goodman.

FILE/LAWRENCE CULLEMAN

Doctor Alan Lutenegger stands with piece of a bridge that he and his students are currently reconstructing. When finished, the bridge will become a permanent part of the UMass campus.

The second bridge, which was donated by a family in South Amherst, will be placed near Lorden field, north of the Mullins Center. In the spring, a third bridge will be placed right in front of Marsden Hall for display.

The idea for the project was born when civil engineering alumni David Scott told Lutenegger about the Vermont truss bridge that needed rebuilding. Scott is now an engineer with the Vermont Department of Transportation.

"It just struck me," Lutenegger said "Wouldn't it be neat to rebuild an old bridge."

The idea has struck many of Lutenegger's engineering students as well. As many as 40 students have worked on the project so far, with an average of three to 10 students signing up each week. The project has included bridges from East Windsor, Conway, and Great Barrington.

Most of the student volunteers come from the Department of Civil and Environmental Engineering and the Student Chapter of the American Society of Civil Engineers on campus, where Lutenegger recruits his help during chapter meetings.

However, building bridges requires dedication. The project is done on class time, often on Friday afternoons. Like Goodman, some students chose to participate over the summer as well.

Lutenegger says that having the project outside of class keeps it lighter, and highlights those students who are truly passionate about their field.

During the fall and spring the bridges are built and worked on outside in a little field at the west end of campus. In the winter, new pieces for the bridges are made indoors.

Although the project seems to mainly attract engineering students, Dr. Lutenegger is encouraging anyone who is interested to become involved.

By spring 2005, Lutenegger's goal is to have three bridges completed on campus. He hopes the project will run for at least ten years, and reconstruct a total of eight bridges that will be used as bike paths, and running or walking trails all over campus.

The bridges will also become part of a living history outdoor museum, which will provide a walking tour of the campus to each of the truss bridge sites. Each bridge will be paired with a sign explaning its historical significance and the steps that were taken to restore it.

Lutenegger hopes to have a virtual tour online so that people all over the country can experience the bridges in a, "real and virtual way." He also plans to invite local elementary and middle school classes to tour the bridges.

The "Adaptive Use Bridge Project" is made possible through cash donations, in-kind services, equipment and materials. The project has no state funding, however Lutenegger is applying for an educational grant from the National Science Foundation.

Fire leaves 12 homeless Officials suspect arson at Presidential complex

An early morning fire on Saturday that left residents in 12 units of the Presidential Apartment complex on North Pleasant Street homeless may have been purposely set.

Firefighters arrived at building 84-87 around 2:30 a.m. after receiving a 911 call to find smoke coming from the front and rear doors of the building. Firefighters extinguished a fire in the basement, which was traveling up to the first and second floor. Several small fires on the first floor were also extinguished. All residents of the four apartments were evacuated safely, according to the Amherst Fire Department.

"We pretty much ruled out any accidental cause for the fire," said state Police Sgt. Frank E. Hart of the state Fire Marshal's office on Sunday, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette. "There's only one obvious conclusion left. Arson is definitely a potential cause."

A woman was treated on the scene for a asthma attack, but was not taken to the hospital. None of the 37 responding firefighters, three chief officers, or the chaplain were injured.

Four pumpers, two ambulances, and an aerial ladder also responded.

Eight additional apartments attached to the structure were evacuated due to smoke. 12 units were deemed uninhabitable and ordered to be shut down by the Amherst Building Commissioner — two from fire damage and 10 are without water and have smoke damage. Water was cut off when basement pipes melted in the heat of the blaze. The damage estimate will exceed $50,000, according to the Amherst Fire Department.

Residents of the building are staying with family and friends and did not require Red Cross assistance. They will be unable to return to their homes until complex owner Toby Cohen has electrical wiring and water pipes inspected and restored, as well as any structural damage.

According to the Hampshire Gazette, fire officials are asking anyone who may have witnessed suspicious activity in the area of Presidential Apartments at the time of the fire to contact area fire departments or the Amherst police.

UMass police K-9 finds loaded handgun, bags of marijuana in traffic stop

Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Six plastic bags of marijuana and a loaded Taurus 22 caliber handgun were found by University of Massachusetts police during a traffic stop on University Drive early Friday morning.

The driver, 20-year-old Angelo S. Privette of 117 Dawes Street, Springfield, Gammar Privette, 20, also of that address, and passenger Michael A. Baz, 20, of 45 Oak Grove Avenue, Springfield, were arrested for possession of a class D substance and intent to distribute.

Angelo Privette was also charged with carrying a firearm without a license, carrying a firearm on school grounds, and leaving a firearm in a motor vehicle.

Police stopped the black 2000 Acura SE at 2:56 a.m. when the officer running the license plate noted that the owner of the car was driving with a suspended license. Upon approaching the vehicle, a strong odor of marijuana was detected through an open window.

Baz was recognized in the right rear passenger seat as an individual who had already been issued a warning for trespassing on University grounds.

"He is a non-student who we [UMPD] have interacted with in the past," said Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald.

Archbald said a trespass may be issued to anyone who has been involved in malicious destruction, such as breaking and entering.

"[Baz] returned to campus with the trespass still in effect," said Archbald. "That alone was grounds for arrest."

UMPD K-9 dog Max was also called to the scene for a search of the car. Police found cigarette butts and loose baggies with marijuana in the passenger compartment and in the trunk.

Archbald said some of the bags were packaged for both distribution and personal use. The handgun containing five shots was found under the front passenger seat.

College students required to receive meningitus shots by 2005

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Correspondent

Beginning in the spring semester of 2005, undergraduate and graduate students who choose to live on Massachusetts's college campuses will be required to get meningitis vaccinations.

Governor Mitt Romney put the mandatory vaccination into legislation on July 30 this past summer. The inoculations will cost $75 per person, unless covered under health insurance. Officials at the University of Massachusetts University Health Services and Mass. Department of Public Health feel the vaccine will be a positive addition to the list of other shots already required for college students.

But some students at UMass are already opposing the mandatory vaccine.

Junior John Beale cited cost as one of his reasons for disagreeing with the vaccine enforcement.

"I don't like shots, and I'm not gonna pay $75 for one," Beale said.

Meningitis is a disease where meningal coccae, bacteria in the body, flow into a person's bloodstream and travel to the brain, causing an infection of the fluid in the spinal cord and fluid surrounding the brain.

Symptoms for the epidemic include fever, muscle ache, rash, and stiff neck. Some types of the disease can be treated with antibiotics; however, the infected can be left with brain damage, hearing loss, and learning disabilities.

In some severe instances, such as University of Kansas student Andy Marso, toxins from the disease can destroy skin tissue and cause major brain damage. In Marso's case, toxins released by the disease spread throughout his body, resulting in the amputation of all his toes, most of his fingers, leaving him with a right thumb.

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Andy Marso is shown hospitalized with bacterial meningitus in June 2004. Doctors were forced to amputate all his toes and fingers, except his right thumb.

"I think it makes sense. If I was a parent of a student attending college, I would want this [vaccine] done," said Alfred DeMaria, director of Communicable Disease Control at the Mass. Department of Public Health. DeMaria also pointed out that the vaccines scheduled to be administered to students do have limitations.

"The vaccine protects people from 75 percent of the four types of meningal coccae. But one is not in the vaccine. And the shot doesn't last that long, only for two or three years."

"All students have immunization requirements, and this will be added," said Ann Becker, Public Health nurse at UMass University Health Services. "We will be meeting with people from the Department of Public Health. This will be our work for the year. We offer it here now, it has always been available at University Health Services."

Becker said that the shots are generally not covered by the state, but some students may be able to be reimbursed for the $75 cost.

According to DeMaria, college students overall don't have a high risk of getting the disease. Five out of 100,000 college students will get infected with meningitis.

DeMaria strongly advised students who are new to campus or have transferred from another school to receive the $75 inoculation. However, UMass economics major Justin DeAngelis feels the choice should be left up to the individual student.

"I don't think its right to charge students for an inoculation that has been considered controversial," said DeAngelis. "I think students should be able to decide what kind of needles they want to put in their arms."

Gun sellers say lifting the assault ban is no big deal TEC-9s legal for purchase

By Nicole Ziegler Dizon
Associated Press

CHICAGO (AP)— The U.S. ban on assault weapons is ending not with a bang but a whimper.

The decade-long ban expired Monday. The measure, signed by President Clinton, had outlawed 19 types of military-style assault weapons, banned certain features on firearms such as bayonet mounts, and limited ammunition magazines to 10 rounds.

But gun sellers and manufacturers say they do not expect to see any immediate surge in orders for the weapons.

"The thought that people are lined up around the block or that guns are going to flood the streets, that's nonsense," said Mark Westrom, owner of firearms manufacturer Armalite Inc.

For one thing, the gun industry says, weapons very similar to those banned have been legally available over the past decade. Also, because of a grandfather clause in the 1994 law, assault weapons or ammunition clips that were manufactured before the ban took effect could still be legally sold over the past 10 years.

Gregory Tropino, president of G.A.T. Guns in Dundee, said his store has fielded several calls about the ban's end, but none from people clamoring for the new guns.

Joe McBride, president of McBride's Guns in Austin, Texas, said he expects interest in the new ammunition magazines, but he has not noticed any increase in traffic at his store over news of the ban's end. McBride said some gun dealers also might be leery of stocking up too much on post — ban firearms.

"I think there's some wariness about what might be reinstated after the election," McBride said.

A clause in the 1994 ban said it would expire unless Congress specifically reauthorized it. President Bush did not lobby the Republican — controlled Congress to renew the ban, and the deadline passed without a vote.

The expiration of the ban means firearms like TEC-9s can now be legally bought. But some of the 19 weapons- foreign- made guns like the Russian- or Chinese- made AK - 47 and the Israeli - manufactured Uzi - are still banned under a 1989 law prohibiting imports of specific automatic weapons.

At Armalite, based in Geneseo, Westrom said it will take some time for the company to produce and ship rifles that contain features the act banned.

Even so, he said, the rifles will appeal mainly to collectors, not the hunters and target shooters who account for a good portion of Armalite's business.

Candidate Update 2004

49 Days and counting.....

Senator John F. Kerry

President George W. Bush

John Kerry – Taking Back America

Massachusetts Senator and Democratic Presidential Candidate John F. Kerry is promising all Americans that help is the way.

"With only 49 days left on the campaign trail, Senator Kerry has taken aim at President Bush and criticized him for not serving in the military. He accuses Bush of claims that he made stating that he did once serve in the U.S. Air Force and according the democratic national committee, he did not.

"George Bush has a clear pattern of lying about his military service," said Iano Cabrera, director of communications for the DNC.

He also criticizes Bush for breaking promises in Iraq. He continues to say that President Bush misled America into war and that our country is headed in the wrong direction in Iraq.

"George W. Bush's wrong choices have led America in the wrong direction on Iraq and left America without the resources we need here at home," the presidential candidate said. "The cost of the president's go-it-alone policy in Iraq is now $200 billion and counting." Kerry told the Associate Press Wednesday.

In a radio address on Saturday, Sept 11 Kerry put his campaigning aside and remembered the victims of 9/11.

"On September 11, 2001, they and nearly 3,000 others were living out the daily rhythm of life in a nation at peace. But on that morning, in a single moment, they were lost, and our land was changed forever," Kerry said during his address.

George Bush – A Safer America

President George W. Bush is campaigning rigorously for the next six weeks as the race to the white house continues to intensify.

Bush and his opponent has taken jabs at the Kerry Campaign too. Bush has consistently been calling Kerry the flip-flop Senator from Massachusetts claiming that he voted for the war in Iraq, even though he is campaigning against it now.

According to Stephen Schmidt, spokesperson for the Bush/Cheney '04 campaign, "John Kerry's shifting positions on Iraq have left Americans with little confidence that he has the conviction and leadership necessary to fight and win the War on Terror. He has taken more positions than anyone can keep track of, and he is losing credibility on the issue."

In a surprise visit, President George Bush visited the Russian Embassy to sign the book of condolences after the Beslan hostage crisis that killed 335 people.

"The killers once again remind us of the duties we have as free people to work in concert, to work in unity, to make this world a better place," Bush said.

President Bush paused on Saturday to grieve and remember those who lost their lives on 9/11. He along with First Lady Laura Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife Lynne Cheney visited and paid tribute at a memorial ceremony in Manhattan.

Top colleges get C in voter registration

By Emily Fredrix
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The semester just started at most schools, but the grade is already in for more than a third of the nation's colleges on the assignment of helping to register young voters — a C or worse.

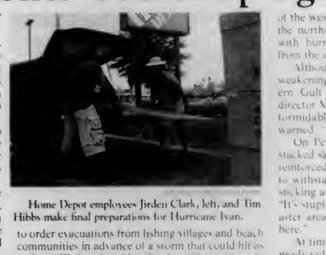
Harvard University's Institute of Politics and The Chronicle of Higher Education sent surveys to 815 colleges and universities in August to determine whether they met the spirit of the Higher Education Act. Passed in 1998, the law requires any university receiving federal funds to request sufficient voter registration forms for its entire campus four months before registration deadlines.

Some 249 schools responded to the survey, which was released Monday. Seventeen percent of the schools met the requirement and 37 percent said they graded their effectiveness at registering young voters at C or worse.

"It was pretty clear that not all knew what the requirements were under the Higher Education Act," said Philip Sharp, director of the Harvard Institute.

Other findings from the survey, sent in August to presidents of two and four-year colleges, show that about one-third of schools have had rallies or protests on campus and voter registration drives are held at seven in 10 schools. About half of the schools felt they were effectively registering young voters.

Florida residents board up against Ivan



By Bill Kaczor
Associated Press

PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) — Rather than roll the dice on where 160-mph Hurricane Ivan might strike, Gulf Coast residents from Florida's Panhandle all the way to the bayous of Louisiana spent Monday boarding up their houses, tying up their boats and making plans to evacuate.

"I'm getting the hell out of here. This thing's too big," charter boat captain Jerry Weber said as he steered his 41-foot vessel up the Apalachicola River out of harm's way. "It doesn't matter where it comes ashore, not at this size."

The hard-to-predict Category 5 storm, one of the most powerful hurricanes ever to hit the Caribbean, killed at least 68 people in a devastating run through Barbados, Grenada, Jamaica and the Cayman Islands. The storm was headed toward Cuba on Monday.

Emergency officials in several Florida Panhandle counties were expected to decide Monday whether to order evacuations from fishing villages and beach communities in advance of a storm that could hit as early as Wednesday. Already, the military bases in the region flew some 275 aircraft out of the area.

At 5 p.m. EDT, Ivan was centered 30 miles south of the western tip of Cuba, and was headed toward the northwest at near 9 mph. It had also grown, with hurricane-force winds extending 115 miles from the eye.

Although some forecasters predicted some weakening over the cooler waters of the northeastern Gulf of Mexico, National Hurricane Center director Max Mayfield said Ivan would still be "very formidable." "It's going to hit somebody," he warned. "This is a very, very dangerous hurricane."

On Pensacola Beach, Mark Sigler and his son stacked sandbags across the driveway of their steel-reinforced dome house that is supposedly designed to withstand hurricane force winds. They were not sticking around to find out.

"It's stupid to stay unless you like camping in a disaster area," he said. "There's no reason to be out here."

At times along its wobbly path, forecasters had predicted Ivan could make direct hits on either the Florida Keys or populous South Florida, only to see it veer west and sidestep both areas.

Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama residents had thought they were in the clear, until Ivan shifted over the weekend and put them in the possible path.

Primaries set for today

BOSTON (AP) — Voters in all but 22 of Massachusetts' 351 communities have primary choices on their ballot Tuesday, but Secretary of State William Galvin anticipates turnout of only 10 percent due to the absence of a noteworthy statewide race.

Statewide, primary ballots feature 57 contests, including 38 legislative races, five in the Senate and 33 in the House. These will determine the final slate for the November showdown between state Democrats, who hold a vast majority in both chambers, and Republicans, who are trying to turn the tide.

The biggest primary battles, however, are sheriff races in Suffolk and Worcester counties.

In Suffolk County, which includes Boston, Sheriff Andrea Cabral is trying to fend off a challenge by Boston City Councilor Stephen Murphy. The winner will automatically win the seat, because there is no Republican challenger.

Putin announces new series of anti-terror plans for Russia

By Mara Bellaby
Associated Press

MOSCOW (AP) — Responding to a spate of deadly terror attacks, President Vladimir Putin announced a series of anti-terror initiatives Monday that would strengthen the Kremlin's grip on every layer of Russian political life.

Putin told Cabinet members and security officials convened in special session that the future of Russia was at stake, and called for creation of a powerful anti-terror agency.

"The organizers and perpetrators of the terror attack are aiming at the disintegration of the state, the breakup of Russia," he said. "We need a single organization capable of not only dealing with terror attacks but also working to avert them, destroy criminals in their hideouts and, if necessary, abroad."

Despite the plans for the new anti-terrorism agency, the proposals were short on security measures, focusing instead on electoral changes, including the elimination of popularly elected governors and an overhaul of the way Russians elect their parliament – a measure likely to increase the control of the dominant, pro-Kremlin faction.

EDITORIAL OPINION

The red herring of leadership

The national conventions this summer broke new ground in the ways of ideological cowardice and political myopia. The Democrats, shamelessly and repetitively exploited their candidate's decorated Vietnam service, to paint themselves as stronger on defense than their counterparts, the Republicans. Who, night after night sent some of their most moderate party members to the podium during the prime-time slots. One could sense an almost overpowering fear between both parties, terrified of stepping on the toes of those oh-so-unpredictable swing voters. As a result, the bulk of the conventions — varying only slightly in degree among parties — were designed to circumvent the major policy questions of our time (particularly and crucially with regard to the situation in Iraq), instead taking shelter behind petty mockery, the empty rhetoric of "values," and the red herring of "leadership."

Mike Sances

The first two of these I feel have been, for the most part, received, as they ought to be. However, the particularly excessive focus on leadership during the Republican National Convention appears to have resulted in the word in question being widely accepted as a real and tangible issue, one worthy of major coverage. Particularly alarming to me was a recent Washington Post online poll, found in the wake of that more recent convention, which asked readers which of the two leading candidates they felt best fit the description "strong leader."

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani best summed up the current Republican attitude toward leadership during the convention. In a speech littered with intermittent usage of the word, or a variant thereof, the former New York mayor proudly proclaimed, "In choosing a president, we really don't choose just a Republican or Democrat, a conservative or a liberal. We choose a leader. And in times of war and danger, as we're now in, Americans should put leadership at the core of their decision."

The incumbent, Giuliani further claimed, possesses, "the courage of his convictions" — a slightly more refined version of the popular view that Bush, love him or hate him, "sticks to his guns" no matter what the odds are and no matter how harsh the criticisms may be.

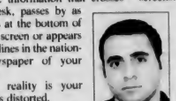
Leadership itself is a neutral term with no discernable positive or negative connotation. One can be an excellent leader, the greatest in history even, and still end up being a horrible monster, one we would loath to associate ourselves with. Take Hitler or Mussolini, for example. Pick any fascist, any brutally authoritarian dictator from the rogue's gallery of history, and there you are sure to find some of the most gifted "leaders" ever to walk the earth, "sticking to their guns" and resisting all critics until the very end, often taking millions with them.

Osama bin Laden, to cite a contemporary example, is probably one of the most brilliant leaders of the modern world. Bin Laden too possesses that same stubborn moral clarity championed by Giuliani, guiding his followers on a clear and coherent direction toward a certain and consistent set of goals.

The point here is that absent a desirable policy direction, the word "leadership" is entirely meaningless. For Giuliani and the other RNC speakers to focus so intensely on a personality trait that is dependent on policy to be adequately judged (and thus vacuous on its own) means that the Republicans are confident their audience has already been won over to the rightness of their ideology — that, or John Kerry and John Edwards are right, and the Republicans can't talk about policy because their policies are all failed ones.

Further, when Giuliani instructs the electorate that their mission in November is to pick

One can be an excellent leader, the greatest in history even, and still end up being a horrible monster, one we would loath to associate ourselves with.



a leader, and not a platform, he is assuming that the voters have already concluded there is no substantial difference between the views of the left and the views of the right. While this may be true to a large extent in mainstream discourse, such a blatant attempt to blur the lines between the stark opposites of conservatism and liberalism should be considered a gross insult to the voters' intellect (not to mention to respective adherents of either persuasion).

As one of his party's most liberal members, (abortion rights, pro-gun regulation, pro-civil unions for same-sex couples), mayor Giuliani might very well hold the same distorted view of American politics he recently put forth at the RNC. Whether or not this is true, Americans would do well to notice just how scared the two parties are to speak freely of their core views. And should also keep in mind that there are actual ideas beneath the surface that, if admitted to the White House, could and inevitably will yield actual results.

Whether you notice it or not, you're told what to like, who to like and who to side with. You may not notice it and you may even think the news you read is accurate. Perhaps you will never even question the information that crosses your desk, passes by as banners at the bottom of the TV screen or appears as headlines in the national newspaper of your choice.

Yousef Munayyer

The reality is your reality is distorted.

Take, for example, the front page of the New York Times on Sept. 1st. On that page you would find coverage of a suicide bombing in Beersheba, which killed many people and wounded more after two buses were targeted. The story would be hard to miss placed on the front page.

A week later Israeli helicopters fired rockets into Gaza killing 15 Palestinians. The next morning I picked up the New York Times again and began looking for the coverage of this story. Page after page I turned and a feeling of disgust grew inside me. This feeling wasn't caused by not seeing coverage of the attack on the front page, rather, I felt disgusted because I naively still had hope to see it there. Something inside me knew exactly where I could find it. When I reached page A12, the last page of the international news section, I found it. A 500 word blurb about 15 dead Palestinians appeared on the lower right corner as if the article was just barely newsworthy. It appeared directly below an article about Israeli weapons technology.

The divide between Israelis and Palestinians is not only a border, not only a racist wall, but it also exists in the marketing of our news and at the center of our moral conscience. Fifteen people were killed, however, depending on which side they were from will determine whether or not the deaths of those human beings were newsworthy.

Palestinians are not perceived as less human on the pages of our papers and on our television screens. They are portrayed as unworthy. The constant barrage of media empires has implanted a racist bias into our morality, which we may not even notice.

Also, in last weeks New York Times, I read a headline that left me thinking. It read, "Despair and anger at Russians give rise to suicide attacks," heading a story in the center of the front page. I could not help but imagine a slightly different headline. I envisioned the page displaying, "Despair and anger at Israelis give rise to suicide attacks," but such a headline exists only in the imagination.

There seems to be a constant effort to dehumanize Palestinians, to make it seem as if any action taken by Palestinians is the cause of some morally corrupt society or some evil inhuman force. The headline, which explained the terror in Russia as a result of Russian oppression of Chechnyans, would never be used to explain the violence in the Palestinian conflict.

Reading about the "black widows," a name given to a group of Chechnyan woman who resist Russian oppression after loosing their husbands or children in war, made me think of Palestinian mothers who have lost husbands and in many cases several children to Israel's Kafkain apparatus.

On the news you may here about Palestinian suicide bombers, which some media outlets call, "homicide bombers," in an attempt to completely erase the Palestinian from the story as to avoid mention of his history, his struggle and his desperation. Perhaps you may have even seen news clips of a recently dead suicide bomber reading his last testament in front of some Arabic script, he may even have his head wrapped with a Palestinian kuffiyeh, but rarely will you ever here what he is saying.

The speeches, which are in Arabic and rarely translated, usually detail a personal story. These are stories of desperation, stories of deaths, of a person who has lost a mother, or a child or a brother. These are the stories of the occupied, the humiliated and the dismayed. These are the stories of millions of Palestinians and these are precisely the stories that are kept from us to completely dehumanize the Palestinian in every way possible.

The deaths in Gaza were reported, which is better than many other incidents that never make it to the newsworthy pile in the editor's room. Hundreds of Palestinians die without even being mentioned as numerals in our daily press. A wonderful website, www.ifamericansknew.org, details the media coverage in several newspapers and displays the racist coverage which skews our public opinion about the unabashedly horrific policies of the state of Israel. On the site you will see results of studies done comparing actual deaths to deaths reported, the difference is more than startling.

If Americans knew, the situation in Palestine would be much different, but the problem is they don't. The hurdles to truth that the media places before us require near Olympian endurance to overcome, but if you are like me, you will start reading your news section from page A12 and work your way to the front.

Mission : huge pecs

I am, without question, UMass' most recognizable man. Standing at a perch of six feet, five inches, with some outrageously bleach blonde hair, I am seen everywhere I go. Find me a person with brighter hair, and I will prove my point by towering over them by the usual seven inches. Find someone taller than me, and I will point my fingers at my hair, as if to say, "You really thought you could beat this, too?" In terms of being recognizable, no one beats the one-two combination of my height and hair.

Zach Oelschlegel

It's convenient when meeting people. They will usually tell me that they've seen me walking around campus when I am introduced to them, or they'll say something like, "Hey! You go to the hockey games! You're really loud and obnoxious!"

I like that feeling.

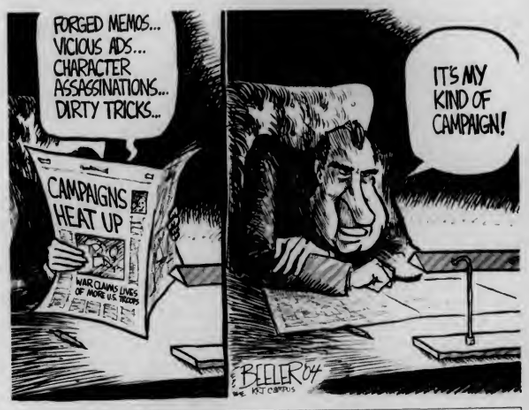
There are disadvantages, however. Despite my desire for attention, I sometimes don't want people to see me. This occurs typically at a dance or formal type setting, when all the really tiny people have moves to go along with that shake, and then there's that tall guy in the middle with the hair, who is waving his arms in some odd manner, and occasionally swiveling his hips, who then trips over his size fifteen foot and nails the floor in the fashion of a skydiver when his parachute fails to open.

It's a good thing that I have finally stopped growing because my propensity to be awfully uncoordinated would be even worse. Other things that have made me look foolish in the past are slowly being eliminated. For instance, I have recently begun to bathe regularly, and that filthy oaf you saw stumble into class is no more. I found out that, unfortunately, people still know how unsanitary you are despite the amount of cologne and Febreze you put on that morning. Speaking of Febreze, I now do my laundry on a weekly basis, and even take the time to fold it. I've also started reading books like Plato's, "Republic" in purposefully very public places so people get the impression that I'm intelligent when they see me.

So, really, there's just one more thing that I need to do in order to be complete as "that guy" here at UMass. A decent sense of humor, good hygiene, and being recognizable will only get you so far these days. In all seriousness, what it really comes down to is that I need to be strong enough to the point where my nipples pop out of my shirt.

One used to be a stud by simply using his wit and charm (neither of which I have) to attract women. But the Arnold Schwarzenegger's of this world have ruined it for us typically un-beefy males who lack the washboard abs and perky nipples that show through our clothing. We could do things the easy way by just buying extra small shirts, but that would be the equivalent of a bald man growing his hair out to eight inches on one side of his head so he could brush it over to the other side. Just as all of humanity knows that the man with a comb-over truly has little hair left and is quite bald, all females know when a man's nipples are ripping out of his shirt because the shirt was made for someone the size of Haley Joel Osment.

A decent sense of humor, good hygiene, and being recognizable will only get you so far these days. In all seriousness, what it really comes down to is that I need to be strong enough to the point where my nipples pop out of my shirt.



Therefore, I need to start working out. I had a dexi-scan done for my exercise science class last fall, and my body fat percentage is roughly the same as Miracle Whip. It doesn't mean that I suffer from obesity (I'm actually quite skinny), but it does mean that minus my bones, brains, and vital organs, I have about seven and a half pounds of actual muscle. This is why I was unable to carry more than my pillow up the stairs on move-in day. The next step is finding a gym that carries weights small enough for a person of my strength. I know that the Wellness Centers carry weights all the way down to five pounds, but those are just embarrassing to hoof around. I need some inflatable weights, ones that would expand so it would look like I was lifting a lot, but would actually be in my weight range.

I'm also lacking the desire. I told myself that I would get in great shape for my spring break trip to Panama City last year and that never really materialized. I went to the gym for about a month, and got discouraged after not being able to bench press more than thirty-six pounds, with the Schwarzenegger's of UMass laughing at me as they drank their protein shakes.

But this year is going to be different. It all comes down to which gym has the weakest members, who can only bench twice as much as I can, so I don't get too discouraged over the first few months of training. Then I will be able to achieve my dream of having my nipples rupture from my chest. For the first time, women on campus will see me and be turned on rather than off. I will be taking full advantage of my height-hair combo, which will render me unstoppable when coupled with the muscles ripping from my body. I will no longer be wasted potential.

Until then, does anyone know where I can purchase some extra small shirts?

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A LETTER FROM THE SGA PRESIDENT

We would like to welcome all students to UMass. This letter from the SGA President and Trustee, is hopefully the first in a series throughout the year. We were elected into office with goals to make the SGA accessible, accountable and effective. Letting the student body, through letters in the Daily Collegian, know what our goals are, what our accomplishments are and what needs to be done is an important first step in demonstrating the relevance and accountability of student government.

However, it is you, the student body that are the heart and soul of UMass. Because of this, we have a right and responsibility to control the workings of this school. The Student Government Association (SGA) is the organization that empowers students to do just that. With this in mind, we would like to inform you of a few things that we have on our agenda.

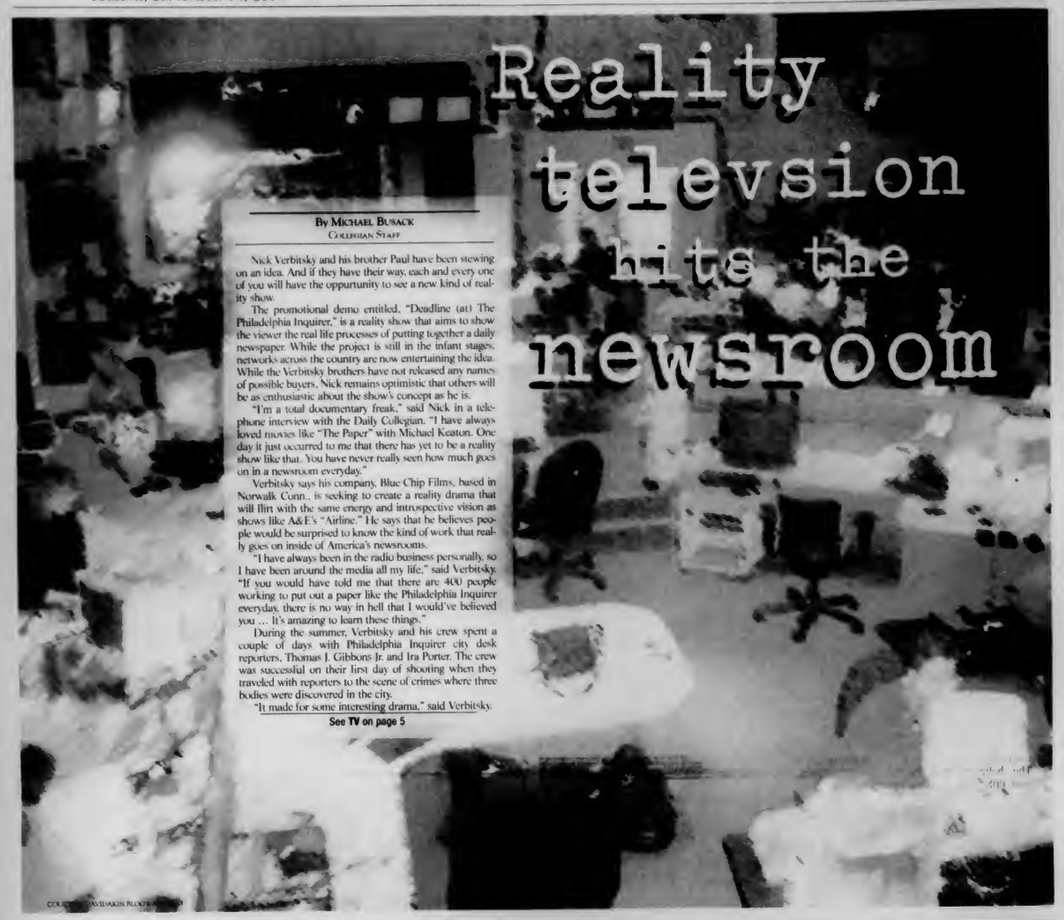
First, the $65 International Student Fee was abolished over the summer, and students who paid it will be refunded. This is due to the hard work, perseverance and dedication of all those who fought against this unfair fee last year with protests, marches and hunger strikes. This victory demonstrates students' ability to effect change, and we would like to personally thank all those who took part in the cause, particularly our friends in the Graduate Employment Organization.

Our highest priority is, and has been, the astronomic prices of textbooks. Textbook publishers are the worst culprits in this crisis by taking in exorbitant profits, printing unnecessary new editions and bundling extraneous materials with books. Together with other schools and public interest groups, we are committed to solving that issue.

On a more local scale, we have met with numerous administrators to discuss the feasibility of instituting a textbook rental system here on campus. Both administrators and representatives of Follett have been receptive to the idea, and we are striving to get faculty and students to help push for a more economical textbook model. In the first week of school, we will be active in front of the Textbook Annex, and we encourage all students to join us in speaking out.

Another high profile issue is our desire to convert to a four-course per semester system. Currently under the five-course system, we feel that too much time is spent scrambling for classes and not enough studying. By converting to a 4 course per semester model, we would reduce class size, increase class availability, and increase quality of education. We are working with the faculty and administration to try and institute this system. This is a very feasible goal over the next few years whose success depends on student support and involvement.

Our third, final, and perhaps most important campaign is educational access and affordability. Put simply, with rising SAT admittance standards, skyrocketing student fees, increased stress on recruiting out-of-state students, and the lowest state support for financial aid in the nation, how will UMass maintain its land grant mission to be affordable and accessible to the people of Massachusetts? Change comes in steps; for example, an $8,000 scholarship that was once offered to in-state high school valedictorians is now offered to students that get 1400 or higher on their SAT's. If you wish to see an affordable and accessible UMass, the time to act is now.



In closing, there are many other decisions that the administration will make. Should we create more substance-free housing? Do we really want surveillance cameras in our dorms? These are just a few examples of the issues our school will face over the next year, and the way to make your opinion count is through the SGA. So, I urge all of you to come out and make your voice heard. We were recently ranked the 7th most active student body in the nation. Next year let us be No. 1. On that note, we wish everyone a good year at UMass.

Reality television hits the newsroom

By MICHAEL BUSACK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Nick Verbitsky and his brother Paul have been stewing on an idea. And if they have their way, each and every one of you will have the oppurtunity to see a new kind of reality show.

The promotional demo entitled, "Deadline (at) The Philadelphia Inquirer," is a reality show that aims to show the viewer the real life processes of putting together a daily newspaper. While the project is still in the infant stages, networks across the country are now entertaining the idea. While the Verbitsky brothers have not released any names of possible buyers, Nick remains optimistic that others will be as enthusiastic about the show's concept as he is.

"I'm a total documentary freak," said Nick in a telephone interview with the Daily Collegian. "I have always loved movies like "The Paper" with Michael Keaton. One day it just occurred to me that there has yet to be a reality show like that. You have never really seen how much goes on in a newsroom everyday."

Verbitsky says his company, Blue Chip Films, based in Norwalk Conn., is seeking to create a reality drama that will flirt with the same energy and introspective vision as shows like A&E's "Airline." He says that he believes people would be surprised to know the kind of work that really goes on inside of America's newsrooms.

"I have always been in the radio business personally, so I have been around the media all my life," said Verbitsky. "If you would have told me that there are 400 people working to put out a paper like the Philadelphia Inquirer everyday, there is no way in hell that I would've believed you ... It's amazing to learn these things."

During the summer, Verbitsky and his crew spent a couple of days with Philadelphia Inquirer city desk reporters, Thomas J. Gibbons Jr. and Ira Porter. The crew was successful on their first day of shooting when they traveled with reporters to the scene of crimes where three bodies were discovered in the city.

"It made for some interesting drama," said Verbitsky.

'Hero' fares better over new Witherspoon film

'Vanity Fair' strays from original while Yimou puts new spin on classic

By JOHNNY DONALDSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While both "Vanity Fair" and "Hero" are both set in the past, only one vibrates with sensory pleasure of the future.

"Vanity Fair," Mira Nair's opulent yet dull adaptation of William Makepeace Thackery's classic literary satire is dressed in the lavish pageantry of costumes and set design for a period piece, but the film itself is musty and dead. It has all the allure of a moldering museum piece locked away in storage. "Hero," on the other hand, is a period drama that goes even further back in time (all the way to medieval China), but it has a colorful vibrancy missing from the airless antique that is "Vanity Fair."

'Hero'
Directed by Zhang Yimou
Starring Jet Li, Maggie Cheung
Miramax
96 mins.
Grade B+

In "Vanity Fair," Reese Witherspoon, unsuccessfully hiding her pregnancy, juts her jaw forward with Elle Woods-like determination as Becky Sharpe, a lowly governess who schemes and plots her way into the snobbish demimonde of the British upper class, where life seemingly consists of nothing but balls, riches and elitist insults.

In Thackery's novel, Becky's a calculating anti-heroine, sleeping her way to the top, but Witherspoon and Nair turn her – and the film – into a fantasy of go-girl empowerment. Witherspoon, who played the sneakily underhanded high school presidential candidate Tracey Flick in Alexander Payne's great "Election," should be the perfect choice for the role of Becky Sharpe, but she's started taking far too many cues from "Legally Blonde." Witherspoon's little girl fan base will love her, but that means the film has no bite.

It has no dramatic urgency either. "Vanity Fair" is wan and colorless – a romantic painting that has come haltingly to life. The movie plods from one point in Becky's life to the next, but it proceeds with a glum studiousness. There are a few choice moments of bitter comedy – when the movie attacks with the vicious dissection of snobbery and social climbing like it should – but they're outweighed by the high school English lesson drama of it all. The delectable costumes pass by, but we do not revel in their gorgeousness. We just wish the whole damn excruciating experience were over already.

The film's large ensemble includes good actors like Gabriel Byrne, Rhys Ifans, Bob Hoskins, Eileen Atkins and Jim Broadbent, but no one is given much to do. "Vanity Fair" rushes from scene to scene and all the actors are given a single note to play. Although they play their notes well, the movie lacks depth and focus.

Nair handled a large ensemble well in her last film, the exuberant "Monsoon Wedding," but here she gets dragged down by the swooning detail and a weird fixation on upping the film's Indian content, which results in a sultry Bollywood dance sequence out of place with the film's dusty torpor.

Zhang Yimou's "Hero," which sat on the shelves at Miramax for two years after garnering a best foreign language film Oscar nomination, is an eye-popping martial arts extravaganza in the gravity-defying mold of "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon." Here fighters engage in ballet-like duels while prancing on the surface of lakes. In one scene in particular a warrior parts a silvery curtain of falling water beads to get to another. "Hero" for all its sword-swinging action is not a fight film exactly; it is a work of visual poetry.

Jet Li plays an unnamed swordsman who ventures to the court of an embattled emperor, claming to have single-handedly killed three assassins out to get the king. Nameless, as he is called, tells the story, and the king, in a "Rashomon" like twist, retells the stories, shuffling the details and discrediting Nameless' account.

The plot is hoary, but "Hero" is a lovely movie in which the plot is not really what matters. Yimou and his cinematographer, Christopher Doyle, shade each story in a new color palette – cool blues, vibrant reds, creamy neutrals, and sumptuous greens; the movie takes a breathtaking quality. "Hero" is more set design than anything else. It lacks the poignant drama of "Crouching Tiger," but it is seductive to the eye.

The movie's martial arts struggles are not about violence, but about skill and honor, and the movie is given an emotional center by the performances of Maggie Cheung and Tony Leung. They play Flying Snow and Broken Sword, two of Nameless' adversaries; a pair of lovers who's connected auras gives the film the angle of a tragic love story. Whenever Yimou threatens to get lost in his art, they remind us that the film has a beating heart all its own.

Freud and Lewis debate God

By RICHARD N. OSTLING
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) – It could be the ultimate challenge for a TV show: Debating the topic of God's existence.

How do you bring that subject down to earth? And what on earth do you do for visuals? But the ineffable can be made accessible.

Behold: "The Question of God," two unusual two-hour programs airing on PBS Wednesday and Sept. 22 (check local listings) with home video to follow.

Director Catherine Tatge produced past PBS series about mythology scholar Joseph Campbell and the Bible's Book of Genesis, both hosted by Bill Moyers.

"Question" stems from a book of the same title by psychiatrist Armand Nicholi, who for decades has taught Harvard University courses that compare the lives and religious thought of this odd couple:

Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), the founder of psychoanalysis, arguably the most influential atheist of modern times (now that the credibility of communist Karl Marx has imploded).

C. S. Lewis (1898-1963), English literature scholar at Oxford and Cambridge universities, a hard-bitten atheist who then embraced Christianity and became arguably the era's most influential defender of belief.

These two fascinating fellows allow Tatge to leaven the inevitable talking heads with documentary materials and dramatized re-creations from their lives, artfully filmed in European locales and using their actual words. Peter Eyre plays Freud (yes, complete with cigar) and Simon Jones is a pipe-puffing Lewis.

There's rich Freudian material here. If God is merely the projection of childhood wishful thinking, as Freud thought, did Sigmund himself spurn God because he rebelled against Daddy? And did young Lewis turn atheist because Daddy packed him off to a cruel boarding school after his beloved Mommy died?

The believers may be so pleased PBS is even taking the God issue seriously and portraying Lewis' famous conversion that they'll overlook the subtle tilt against belief. If Lewis had been on the panel he would have answered skeptical challenges that are left hanging and have assailed Freud's lack of proof for his supposedly scientific theories.

So "Question" unwittingly indicates that faith remains on the defensive among cultural elitists, notwithstanding popular-level revivals and the supposed "Twilight of Atheism" proclaimed in a new book by Alister McGrath, a Lewis-style atheist turned Oxford theist. Nicholi's book is far more satisfactory than the TV version on the pros and cons, especially the pros. The programs seem to reflect less of Nicholi, a churchgoing Protestant, than of Tatge, a former Catholic on a "faith journey" married to an agnostic who co-produced.

At the conclusion, Nicholi intones, "Is it possible that Freud and Lewis represent conflicting parts of ourselves, a part of us that yearns for relationship with the source of all joy, hope and happiness ... and another part that raises its fist in defiance?"

He predicts that if a network purchases the show, his crew will follow reporters and photographers alike. Although he spoke mainly about the life of the metro reporter, Verbitsky says he would like to cover reporters, photographers and editors in every section. "Personally, even if this didn't work out, it was an incredible honor to be able to see all of this," said Verbitsky. "It takes a different kind of person to do what these people do. I wanted to hug some of the people we watched in these crime stories, but the journalists, they love their job and they do it well," he added. "It is a tough job to do. Most people know what is going to happen in their nine to five job. These guys wake up everyday to a different day, a different story."

The show is merely talk for now though until Blue Chip Films is able to sell the material and footage they have put together. Mary Flannery, the Philadelphia Inquirer's senior editor for newsroom initiatives says her publication is excited about the idea of the documentary style reality show.

"We think this could be a great oppurtunity to let people know how the news is put together," Flannery said. "We think it will be a great way to give a transparent view into the everyday trials of a newsroom."

Flash enters the hall

NEW YORK (AP) — Grandmaster Flash & the Furious Five are among the nominees for the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame - the first rap artists to get that distinction -joining U2, Randy Newman and the O'Jays on the ballot.

Getting his start as a DJ at Bronx parties in the late 1970s, Grandmaster Flash later joined with the Furious Five for the social commentary of "The Message" and "White Lines (Don't Don't Do It)."

Other nominees include blues guitarist Buddy Guy, rockabilly pioneer Wanda Jackson, rock band the Pretenders, soul singer Percy Sledge, "Centerfold" singers the J. Geils Band and the late country singer Conway Twitty.

Previous nominees on the ballot, the Sex Pistols, Patti Smith, the Stooges, Lynyrd Skynyrd and Grant Parsons.

Singers of "Back Stabbers" and a string of other soulful hits, the O'Jays had their chart heyday in the 1970s. A singer of satirical songs like "Short People," Newman is now one of the Hollywood's most successful composers of movie music.

Musicians, industry professionals and journalists vote, and results of the 20th annual election will likely be announced in December. Artists are eligible to be inducted into the Rock Hall after at least 25 years have passed since their first record was released.

Kimmel to host AMA's

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Jimmy Kimmel's doing it again.

The late-night funnyman will host the American Music Awards for the second consecutive year when the three-hour special airs live on ABC Nov. 14.

"It is an honor to be nominated and I promise that my duet with Christina Aguilera will be a performance that will not be soon forgotten," joked Kimmel, host of the network's "Jimmy Kimmel Live."

Dick Clark, who produces the annual American Music Awards, said Monday he was excited to have him back as the show's host.

"He showed last year that his unpredictability and ability to react to situations around him allows him to bring a unique sense of humor to the stage and to keep the show moving at a fast pace," Clark said.

Nominations for the 32nd annual American Music Awards, meanwhile, will be announced Tuesday.

Olbermann a Playboy?

NEW YORK (AP) – The countdown to the No. 1 sexiest male newscaster ends with ... Keith Olbermann - at least according to a Playgirl magazine online poll.

The host of MSNBC's nightly "Countdown with Keith Olbermann" had linked his Web site to the Playgirl Web site and urged viewers to vote for him. The strategy worked: he came away the winner with 24 percent of the 50,000 votes cast.

"Voter turnout was phenomenal," Michele Zipp, the magazine's editor in chief, said Monday. "Our readers jammed our e-mail server extolling the virtues of all those sexy news guys on TV."

Fox News Channel's Sean Hannity came in second and Anderson Cooper of CNN was third. Andy Rooney of CBS's "60 Minutes" who's #5 tied for fifth place with the boyish Bill Hemmer from CNN. And Fox's Bill O'Reilly received about 200 write-in votes.

Complete results will be listed in the October issue.

As winner, Olbermann won't be taking it all off in Playgirl's pages but he will choose a charity to receive $2,500 on his behalf.

Parker visits fashion show

NEW YORK (AP) – Mary-Louise Parker came to the Luca Luca fashion show to see the cocktail dresses.

"I love his dresses, they are lovely and ladylike," she said Sunday night from the front row at the Bryant Park tents in midtown Manhattan. The show was part of New York Fashion Week, which runs through Wednesday.

Parker, an Emmy nominee for the miniseries "Angels in America," once had many occasions to get dressed up in designer Luca Orlandi's gowns and dresses.

But now that she's a mother, things have changed.

"I definitely don't get out as much as I used to," the 40-year-old actress said with a laugh.

Parker made a striking fashion statement at the Golden Globes earlier this year when she wore a form-fitting black gown with a plunging neckline just two weeks after giving birth to her son, Atticus. When she won the best supporting-actress award, for "Angels in America," Parker thanked her son for helping her fill out her revealing gown.

However, at Luca Luca, Parker opted for a simple blue sweater.

Other celebrities sitting along the catwalk included Jessica Simpson, Anne Hathaway, Venus and Serena Williams wearing complementing salmon-pink dresses and R. Kelly.

Parker returns to Broadway this fall, where she won a Tony for her performance in "Proof," to star in "Reckless."

Monks protest film

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka (AP) – More than 500 Buddhist monks marched in the Sri Lankan capital Monday expressing outrage and demanding a ban on an upcoming Hollywood movie, threatening to fast even to death if their objections were not heeded.

"Hollywood Buddha," made by independent filmmaker Philippe Caland, will be released in California Sept. 24. It's about a struggling Buddhist friend who believes it will bring him luck selling his feature film.

Saffron-robed monks from the Patriotic National Movement marched to the U.S. Embassy denouncing an advertisement of the movie that shows a man seated on the head of a Buddha statue.

Some carried the advertisement while others waved Buddhist flags and staged a sit-down protest shielding themselves with black umbrellas against the blazing midday sun.

"We want the release of this film stopped," said monk Mawarale Baddiya, holding a loudspeaker. "The film scoffs at lord Buddha, his character and his teaching."

The protesters handed a petition to an embassy representative about their objections. But Baddiya warned that if action is not taken their next step would be to begin a fast outside the embassy.

Last week, lawmakers in predominantly Buddhist Thailand expressed similar outrage over the movie.

NHL can't come to terms; season in limbo

By Sarah Talalay and Michael Russo
Knight Ridder

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — With no additional bargaining sessions scheduled, the NHL appears headed toward locking out its 700 players when their contract expires at midnight Wednesday.

The NHL Players Association offered a new proposal Thursday that contained a rollback of salaries, luxury tax and revenue sharing model. The league rejected the proposal, calling it a "repackaged" but "watered-down" version of last October's proposal.

"Nothing more clearly demonstrates the union's unwillingness to acknowledge or meaningfully address this league's problems than this recycled proposal," NHL Executive Vice President Bill Daly said in a statement after Thursday's negotiating session.

The union, however, claims it is the league that's inflexible, focusing only on a salary cap system that the union is unwilling to accept.

"At some point, the owners have to realize the players will never accept a salary cap or a system linking payroll to league revenues. Our proposal represents the most logical compromise to reach an agreement and save hockey this season," NHLPA President Trevor Linden said in a statement. "Unfortunately, the owners have expressed no willingness to engage in any dialogue that could lead to a fair agreement for both sides."

Here's an overview of the labor situation:

Question. Why would the absence of a new labor agreement on Sept. 15 result in a lockout, not a strike?

Answer. Players are not unhappy with the current system and have vowed not to strike. While players could agree to play without a new agreement, it's expected the owners will lock them out and not pay them.

Q. Didn't the NHL extend the current labor agreement twice?

A. Yes. After owners last locked out players for 103 days, canceling 34 games of the 1994-95 season, the sides reached agreement. In 1995, the agreement was extended so the players could participate in the 1998 Winter Olympics in Nagano, Japan, a venture viewed as good for the game. In 1997, the agreement was again extended with the decision to expand the 26-team league to 30 teams.

Q. So what went wrong?

A. With tremendous growth in the game — expansion from 21 to 30 teams in the 1990s and a national television contract — revenues grew 163 percent but salaries rose 252 percent, an equation the NHL says is impossible. The union disputes the league's figures, saying they are closer to revenue increases of 153 percent and salary increases of 170 percent during the life of the contract.

Q. Why does Commissioner Gary Bettman keep referring to "cost certainty?" Isn't that a salary cap?

A. It's partly semantics, but, Bettman insists, a salary cap is only one way to reach "cost certainty" — the concept of tying salaries to revenues. The league says salaries have outpaced revenues and it spent 76 percent of its revenues on player salaries in 2002-03 — far more than any of the three other major sports. The players' union says it will not accept a cap.

Q. What is the Levitt report?

A. The league paid former U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Arthur Levitt Jr. $250,000 to study its finances. The report, released in February, backed up most of the league's claims of losses and financial instability. The union accused the league of a public relations gimmick, charging the report wasn't independent and the union was not involved.

Q. Haven't the sides been meeting? Why can't they reach a deal?

A. They had been until Thursday, but little progress has been made. At their last meeting, the union presented a new proposal, which included a further compromise: a 5 percent rollback in salaries along with revenue sharing and a luxury tax. The league, which says a "cost certain system" is crucial, said it was "disappointed" with the proposal.

Q. What about a luxury tax on the league's highest payrolls?

A. Bettman has rejected a luxury tax.

Q. What about revenue sharing?

A. Revenue sharing between the wealthiest and poorest teams is a possibility, Bettman says, as long as it is within a "cost certain" system. In the absence of "cost certainty," the league says revenue sharing would only reallocate the league's financial loss.

Q. Will franchises be contracted?

A. The NHL says it has no interest in disbanding teams and expects all 30 teams to be healthy under a new economic system. However, some observers think a lengthy lockout could force some owners to pull the plug on their teams.

Q. How much do players earn?

A. Average salaries have grown from $733,000 in 1994-95, when the current agreement was signed, to $1.83 million in 2003-04. The highest-paid players earned $11 million last season.

Q. What about TV rights fees? Don't they usually offset the costs of payroll?

A. Rights fees for hockey are minimal and far less than in other sports. Because hockey is a regional game with low ratings, teams received about $4 million annually under the television deal that expired this year. A new barebones television deal struck in May with NBC and ESPN will provide even less, perhaps no more than $2 million a year.

Q. How long would a lockout last?

A. Several industry sources say they anticipate a resolution by January, which would allow for a shortened season, but others say a lockout could go longer. And the players' association warned at its annual meeting to be prepared for as much as 18 months away from hockey.

Q. Won't the players give in once a work stoppage starts hitting them in the wallet?

A. Both the NHL and the NHLPA have been amassing war chests for some time. The NHL has gathered $300 million to protect its franchises. The NHLPA won't publicize the amount it has saved, but Senior Director Ted Saskin has called it "substantial." The union will pay equal stipends to the league's 700 players, as well as medical and other insurances.

seconds later, Ciconte scored again, this time unassisted. Despite Tocco's best efforts to stop the shot, the ball still managed to sneak past her into the cage.

Tocco earned eight saves during the game, while Maryland goalie Christina Restivo made one save in the first half.

Tocco also earned two saves in Sunday's game against American University, before turning the cage over to freshman Becky Letourneau. Letourneau made her debut on the field this weekend, playing the majority of the AU game.

In Letourneau's time in the cage, she made four saves, only allowing two goals.

"You need to have two goalkeepers ready to go at any time," Shea said. "[Letourneau] was outstanding today. She really threw up the floodgates for us."

The game-winner was scored less than two minutes into the game by senior midfielder Javiera Villagra. Villagra recorded a hat trick in the game, with a total of three unassisted goals.

Camila Infante notched the second goal, assisted by Heidi Hershberger. A minute and a half later, Heather Maranzano scored off a rebound from a diving save by Tocco.

With 17:50 left in the first half, Villagra earned her second goal, followed a minute later with the final goal of the period scored by Shannon Goans.

Villagra's third and final goal came with 17:06 left in the second half. On a penalty corner, Maggie Hall attempted a shot, which was deflected by Letourneau. On the rebound, Villagra managed to sink the ball into the net.

The game's final score came with just under sixteen minutes left to play in the game, an unassisted goal from Alicia Krawitz.

"We didn't bring our successes from the Maryland game to the American game," Shea said.

A gamers adventure to Madden immortality

Jeff Howe

I'm sure most of you can relate to me. I've been playing "Madden" football video games for years now. If you can't relate to me, you probably think I need to spend a few minutes to reevaluate my life.

The game is fun, though, and is there really anything better than having fun? Hey, at least I'm not playing "Doom" or "Dungeons and Dragons."

Over the past three years, "Madden" has gotten progressively more realistic and even more entertaining. If there wasn't anything to do during the day, a group of us would just sit around and play each other. We would taunt each other as if we were playing something that had actual meaning to it, but, in the end, it stopped being as fun for me.

Just ask my friends. I'm better than all of them. I won't name names, but I can guarantee that they're reading this right now, and my tires are about 15 minutes away from being slashed.

So when I heard about the, "Madden Challenge," a tournament in its third year now, I knew I had to sign up for its date at Gillette Stadium on Sunday. I might actually get some real competition outside of my living room for once.

Unfortunately, when I showed up to the Fidelity Investments Clubhouse at 10 a.m. on Sunday morning, I was questioning my own game. I didn't even know which team I was going to play with.

Should I play with the Patriots and give my opponent a decent shot at sacking me every down due to the immobile Tom Brady, or should I play with the Eagles to have an agile quarterback in Donovan McNabb while sacrificing talent all across the rest of the board?

These are questions I shouldn't have to ask myself the morning of a tournament that could land me a trip to Las Vegas and $50 thousand. But I had just spent six days in Hilton Head Island, which set my game a week behind the other 511 people in the tourney.

I'm not asking you to feel sorry for me because Hilton Head is a beautiful place, and I wouldn't trade that trip for the world. My problem is that I'm just too competitive to let variables like that slide. I absolutely hate losing. I won't even let my little cousins win a game of basketball in my backyard. It doesn't matter that they might only be four feet tall, but I'm going to shut them down in every phase of the game.

Well, before I knew it, I was thrown into my first round game. I ended up siding with the Eagles, and my opponent did the same.

Now, if you have never played in the Madden Challenge before, you have no idea how much different it is playing a video game with money and pride on the line in front of a thousand people. I was flat out nervous. My palms were sweating, my stomach was a mess and I couldn't stand still.

Luckily for me, this guy had no idea how to handle a zone defense. I picked off his first pass of the game and took it back to the house for an early lead. I was able to play the rest of the game with a calmness that would have made Manny Ramirez proud.

Two more interceptions and a forced fumble later, I advanced to the second round with a 17-0 victory. That poor guy had to go home to his mother and tell her that he didn't score a single point in the Madden Challenge.

My next opponent turned out to be a guy I stood next to in line during the registration process earlier in the morning. He made the mistake of telling me he won two games in last year's event, so I knew he could play. I casually told him that I had never played a sober game of "Madden" in my life. It was a strategic move on my part since I knew that I would be paired against the people who were closest in line to me.

Well, that strategy worked when he decided to punt on his first possession of the game instead of going for it on 4th-and-2. What I didn't realize was how good of a Patriots' defense I would be up against. I couldn't do anything on offense, so we traded punts through the first half until he took a 7-0 lead.

I thought I was cooked. I had –2 total yards, and there were only a few remaining seconds left in the first half. Then, something magical happened. With "Beast," the tournament emcee behind me, I tossed up a prayer off my back foot to Terrell Owens about 20 yards down field in order to avoid a sack.

It was a dumb throw without question. This was the kind of throw that the Philadelphia media wouldn't have let McNabb live down for the rest of the season. Sometimes in video games, though, crazy things happen. The ball floated through the hands of Ty Law, Terrell Buckley and Rodney Harrison and landed softly in T.O.'s hands, he then sprinted another 60 yards downfield for the tying score just before halftime.

The crowd went ballistic, and Beast starting yelling into the microphone that my lucky clover had just fallen out of my pocket. I was back in the game with two quarters to play.

My opponent received the kickoff and methodically drove down the field. He had crossed my 40-yard-line as the third quarter expired, and his friends told him to run the clock out before kicking a field goal.

I couldn't believe what I was hearing. This guy was about to break the man code, and run the clock out. Any normal guy would have to throw a pink skirt on and be referred to as "Princess" for the next week. He had no shame, though.

With 20 seconds left in the game, he was attempting a 45-yard field goal to clinch his shameless victory. What he may have forgotten, though, was that the luck in this game was on my side.

The field goal looked good for the first 20 yards, but then it gradually began hooking to the left. I began leaping as though I were Carlton Fisk in the '75 World Series. My arms were flailing to the left side of the screen, and the ball followed them. Wide left! Once again, the crowd erupted, and everyone was on my side after they watched him run the clock out in a foolish attempt to claim victory.

I would go on to win the coin toss in overtime and march down the field to win the game with a field goal of my own. Throughout the entire game-winning drive, I must have heard 30 people behind me say, "That guy missed a field goal to win the game, and he's now about to lose."

I was a fan favorite, and I was advancing to the third round. Some people say that it is better to be lucky than good, but I say the "Madden" gods were watching this sorry excuse of a player run the clock out in an attempt to steal the game from me.

My third round opponent had no business being at this tournament. He was awful, but whatever forces helped me win my second game stopped me from winning my third. I couldn't figure out why my defenses weren't blitzing in the direction I was telling them to or why my receivers were running the wrong routes.

By the time the first quarter was over, I realized that my right analog stick was busted. The referee fixed it, but since the score was knotted at zero, he wouldn't let us start the game over.

I was rattled, though. Two of my drives were wasted. A camera crew decided to get in my face next, and I knew my karma had run dry. What's worse is that Ken Walter snuck into my controller, and I shanked my next two punts out of bounds.

The score was tied at zero just before halftime, and my opponent was starting a drive at his 20-yard-line. Tom Brady hit Ben Watson on a five-yard-out pattern. Watson not only broke two tackles as soon as he caught the ball, but he outran my entire secondary on his way to an 80-yard touchdown reception.

Where Watson developed the strength of a tank and gained Mike Vick-like speed was beyond me. The Playstation 2 was against me during this game, and it was even more evident when I was stuffed on a goal-line stand in the fourth quarter. Final score: 7-0.

I wasn't beaten by my counterpart but by the Playstation. Throw in a television camera, and Ben Watson who had the attributes of Bo Jackson in "Techmo Bowl" and I had no chance. I'm getting angry just writing about it now.

Oh, well. I knew that I would need a little luck to bring home the championship, so I won't get too worked up over it. The experience was priceless, too. I had a group of 30 strangers behind me cheering my every move during a video game, and that alone was exciting enough.

I didn't get a trip to Vegas, I'm not $50 thousand richer and I was beaten by the system. Somehow, though, I walked away with a smile on my face.

Now, if you'll excuse me, I'm going to play my 11-year-old cousin in home run derby.

gave Nihan's Baltimore Ravens the victory.

Nihan was flanked by his mother and sister at the tournament, but they weren't the only ones cheering for him. At one point during his third round loss, there were as many as 50 people living and dying with every play. He would often turn around to acknowledge the excitement with fist pumps and high-fives. "It was pretty cool," Nihan said about the crowd support.

Mike "Balla" Brown was the zone referee where Nihan's games were played. "He was very humorous and extremely mature. He said that if he won the $50 thousand, he would give the money to his mother so she could do her kitchen over," Brown noted.

Unlike Nihan, however, this was a business trip for some competitors in the "Challenge." Mike "B-Threat" Vitorino, a 19-year-old New Bedford resident, said he spends two hours a day in Practice Mode in "Madden 2005." He played each game with his headphones on and showboating in front of his opponents.

Vitorino summed up the way he plays each game. "I go thing. Nathan "Young Gunz" Stanton, 20, was the first person in the three-year history of the event rough each defensive player and blitz guys with Playmaker. Ask my last opponent. He felt it," Vitorino said.

At the end of the day, just like in any tournament, there was only one man left standto successfully defend his regional crown. The New York native will be in Las Vegas to play for the national championship December 10-12.

Minutemen square up for Hartford

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The hardest schedule in recent history sure isn't making life easy for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team.

Outscored 9-2 by opponents thus far, the Minutemen (0-3) will face-off against Hartford (2-2) this afternoon at 3:30, in search of their first victory of the season.

A home loss to the Hawks today may cause the Maroon and White faithful to start asking questions about UMass' ability to make it deep into the Atlantic 10 tournament.

UMass' two regular season goals have come from the freshmen duo of Tyler Pagano and Matty Lemire. Pagano netted the lone Massachusetts goal in a 3-1 loss to San Francisco on September 4, while Lemire scored his first collegian goal Saturday, in a 3-1 home loss to Maine.

If the trend continues, the Minutemen may find themselves out of the NCAA playoff hunt before the A-10 portion of the schedule begins.

"Tomorrow is a big game for us, we didn't play well Saturday and it will be a good chance for us to turn things around," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We will make some minor adjustments on the field that will hopefully help us improve."

Youth and inexperience may be the largest hurdle for Massachusetts to overcome — the maroon and white field a team of 10 freshman and two seniors. Seventeen underclassmen will suit up tomorrow for UMass, against a Hartford squad that returns 15 letter winners.

But as far as Koch is concerned, the time for growing pains is over. "There are 11 positions on the field and there is competition for all 11 spots," Koch said. "Class doesn't matter. I expect the freshman to be ready to play, everyone's got to be ready."

To make matters worse for UMass, Hartford looks to have a solid team. Powered by an explosive offense and experienced defense, the Hawks have generated eight goals over four games.

First Team All-New England selection Alon Lubezky of Hartford is arguably the best player on the field. Lubezky became the all-time points leader at Hartford in its season opening victory over Sacred Heart, after scoring a hat trick to begin his senior campaign.

"Hartford is tough. They have a solid program and should be tough competition," Koch said.

Defensive minded Massachusetts must find a way to slow down Lubezky and control the tempo if it is going to be successful. Junior captain Craig Canavan and a senior-less defense will have their sights set on stopping Lubezky, Gorkem Katoglu and Kevin Candito, an offensive trio that have accounted for all Hawk goals.

Unfortunately for the Minutemen the two outings in which UMass played to its potential didn't count. A 3-1 rout of Montreal and a 0-0 draw with ninth ranked Notre Dame were pre-season matches that didn't influence the standings.

Against Montreal, the UMass offense fired on all cylinders, recording three goals on 14 shots. Junior Oral Bullen scored a pair of goals in the first 13 minutes of play, but has been absent from the scorecard ever since.

Bullen, the team's leading returning scorer and tri-captain, finished last season with eight goals and four assists and is thought of as being too talented to remain quiet for long.

Goalies Colin Burns and Nick Billman appeared solid in net for Massachusetts as they shut out the Irish. To begin the season, Fifth ranked Santa Clara shut out the Minutemen 3-0, September 2, but the Broncos boast one of the most successful programs in collegiate soccer.

Hartford defeated UMass 2-0 last year to begin the season. After falling to the Hawks, UMass won seven of the next nine games to reach its highest national ranking ever, No. 13.

MATT REBECO/COLLEGIAN

Ernie Billittier takes a corner kick in a 3-1 loss to Maine last Saturday. The Minutemen take on Hartford at home today for a 3:30 kick-off.

The youth revolution

Ah, so there is some truth to the old adage, "age before beauty."

I'm not talking about it in the cynical comment you make after you hold the door for somebody. I'm using it in the sense that sometimes a person or a team needs to age a little bit before you get to see the diamond in the rough.

Bob McGovern

For the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team this season has looked a bit rusty so far. After losing its first three games of the season, only producing two goals overall, it would seem that there are some questions that desperately need to be answered before the Atlantic 10 season begins against St. Joseph's on October 1st.

Perhaps the question should be: How fast can this young team congeal?

UMass has put together one of its finest recruiting classes in recent memory and bolstering it is a slew of talent that has only been in the spotlight for one season.

Players like junior captains Craig Canavan and Oral Bullen got their first taste of real action at UMass last year. It wasn't their job to carry the team and there was still lingering talent from that 2001 NCAA tournament team that was one of the best soccer teams to ever play at this university.

So now it's time to put up, and what better way to shake the spider webs than to go against some of the best teams in the nation?

Losing to Santa Clara and San Francisco hurts for sure, but no one was blown away when they got the news. The Minutemen got a reality check early, the older guys saw what was out there and the new guys got to see that this isn't high school anymore.

Many people may start to write off UMass early, it only has three seniors, it got ousted early last year, and before the season even started the Minutemen were ranked in the bottom echelon of the A-10. They may ignore the 0-0 tie against then No. 9 Notre Dame as a fluke and write off 2004 as just a run in the mill "rebuilding year."

Maybe that's just what the doctor ordered.

By the time everything clicks, early season woes mean nothing. There is continuity that needs to be formed, and with a team as young and talented as the Minutemen, this continuity will be the key to the post-season.

Including today's game, UMass has four straight in the friendly confines of Rudd Field. After that, the real season begins and the Minutemen will dive right into the mix of the A-10 season.

The Minutemen will be looking towards players like Bullen to spark an offense that has been about as stagnant as the water in the campus pond. Bullen hasn't exactly been a high-octane offensive machine, but how can he?

Last year he had Piah Myers alongside and the offensive burden wasn't so heavy. Those looking towards Bullen to pick up where the likes of Myers left off are to be surely disappointed. They shouldn't, and you know why?

That's not how Bullen plays the game.

Bullen needs a sidekick, someone to play with him, not to him and like anything else that connection takes time. With players like freshmen Tyler Pagano, Matty Lemire (who have the only two goals on the season), and sophomore sensation Richard Higa, it's only a matter of time before the UMass offense heats up.

So maybe this home stand is exactly what they need. Maybe Maine was just first home-game jitters and no one was on the same page. Either way these next four games are what will dictate the success of this team.

It's a matter of figuring out each other's game and becoming fluid as a unit. That's what a team looks like and if the Minutemen figure that out, this will surely be a "rebuilding" season to remember.

Field hockey falls in Maryland

By Paula Aden

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — This weekend the University of Massachusetts field hockey team (0-5) extended its losing streak to five games after being shutout by both the University of Maryland (6-0) and American University (4-2) at the Terrapin Invitational held in College Park.

The Minutewomen were defeated 6-0 in the Terrapin's fourth shutout of the season on Saturday, while the Eagles earned their second shutout of the season on Sunday, 7-0.

The Terps dominated most of Saturday's game, managing 28 shots to the Minutewomen's two. Those two shots, made by Jaime Bawden, came from two consecutive penalty corners midway through the first half. Although it was Massachusetts's best chance to score in the game, the Minutewomen could not make it materialize into a goal. UMass did not receive any other penalty corners during the game, while Maryland had a total of twelve.

"I thought we were dangerous," Massachusetts head coach Patty Shea said of the Maryland game. "There were some outstanding periods of play. We possessed the ball, we attacked the open side of the field, we pushed the ball forward. We worked together as a team, as a unit, and they worked for each other."

Tiffany Marsh scored the first goal — which later proved to be the game-winner — within the first four minutes of the game. Paula Infante, whose sisters Camila and Denise play for American, assisted Marsh on the goal.

Maryland's next score came off of a penalty corner at 14:43. Jannecke van Leeuwen passed the ball to the top of the circle, where Emily Boyer stopped it for Sara Silvetti's goal. With 12:49 remaining in the first half, Anja Boettcher scored an unassisted goal after drawing the ball out of a scuffle in front of the net.

Less than a minute still to play in the first half, Emily Trycinski scored her first career goal after managing to get past Massachusetts goalie Christine Tocco at the top of the circle.

In the second half, Jackie Ciconte earned the final two goals for Maryland. At 22:23, Ciconte scored off a pass from Lauren Powley during an offensive play in the circle. Fifteen

Crooks signed by Frenzy

Dartmouth, Mass. — Boston Frenzy Co-owner and General Manager Dan Savage is pleased to announce the signing of former UMASS standout Shannon Crooks to the Frenzy's backcourt.

Crooks, a Massachusetts native, made an immediate impression on Frenzy Head Coach Joe "Jellybean" Bryant during the team's final free agent camp in Boston last month. Bryant said of Crooks, "Shannon is a natural floor leader who can play both point guard and shooting guard equally well. He has the ability to score and also to make the players around him better with his passing, defense, and intensity.

Crooks graduated from Everett H.S. in 1997 as the schools all-time leading scorer with over 1,700 points. Following high school Crooks attended St. Johns University, however he returned to his home state a year later to play for the Minutemen of UMASS. After solid sophomore and junior seasons, Crooks put an exclamation point on his senior year by leading the Minutemen in scoring, steals, and assists.

Recently, Crooks has played with professional teams in Yugoslavia and Portugal as well as several international traveling all-star teams.Frenzy GM Dan Savage added, "Having a local talent like Shannon help build our franchise is invaluable."

A visit to the Madden Challenge

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

FOXBORO Mass. – About 1,000 people sat outside Gillette Stadium on Sunday morning waiting for the ushers to open the gates. No, the New England Patriots weren't playing (in physical form), but these people were waiting for their shot at a trip to Las Vegas and a grand prize of $50 thousand.

The catch? Someone needed to beat the best of the best in the region in the third annual "Madden Challenge." There would be a 512 person, single elimination tournament inside the Fidelity Investments Clubhouse for more than just video game bragging rights.

Foxboro was just one stop on a 32-city tour across the country to determine who exactly is the best "Madden 2005" player in the land. This is the 15th edition of "Madden," but that game has grown exponentially more popular over the past few years. It was the top selling video game in the country last year.

"The Madden Challenge" is also continuing to grow in popularity through the years. Tour Manager Neil Gustafson noted that competitors would often follow the Madden bus from stop to stop. "We had one guy last year who followed us around to 13 cities. I don't know where they get the time or the funding for that," Gustafson said.

Regardless, the competition was stiff on Sunday. Even though everyone showed up with plans of winning the tournament, the odds were against them.

Matt Durant, a 19-year-old from Adams, Mass., bowed out in the first round. "It was a new experience," he added. "It was better than playing at home. There was tons of pressure with all of these people watching. It was fun, though."

One player who lasted further than the first round and stole the show in Foxboro was 13-year-old Peabody native Chris Nihan. He came out of the gates as enthusiastic as anyone there. His opponents, including Mike White, wrote the young stud off due to his age and small stature.

White, 21, was Nihan's second victim of the day, and he didn't take the loss too easily. "He honestly beat me, but there must have been a computer error," White said, referring to a last second touchdown pass that

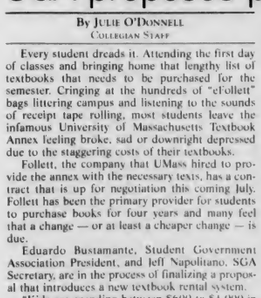
SGA proposes plan for a textbook rental system

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Every student dreads it. Attending the first day of classes and bringing home that lengthy list of textbooks that needs to be purchased for the semester. Cringing at the hundreds of "eFollett" bags littering campus and listening to the sounds of receipt tape rolling, most students leave the infamous University of Massachusetts Textbook Annex feeling broke, sad or downright depressed due to the staggering costs of their textbooks.

Follett, the company that UMass hired to provide the annex with the necessary texts, has a contract that is up for negotiation this coming July. Follett has been the primary provider for students to purchase books for four years and many feel that a change — or at least a cheaper change — is due.

Eduardo Bustamante, Student Government Association President, and Jeff Napolitano, SGA Secretary, are in the process of finalizing a proposal that introduces a new textbook rental system.



"Kids are spending between $600 to $1,000 in textbooks every year," Bustamante said this summer. "In other schools, both public and private, kids are spending $60 to $100 in textbooks."

The first week of classes, Bustamante, Napolitano and other SGA members surveyed dozens of students outside of the Textbook Annex. Students then had their pictures taken — mug shot style — holding a piece of paper that revealed the amount of money they spent on this semester's books.

"Science majors are spending over $600 per semester," Bustamante said, "and nursing majors, its even worse, they're spending up to $800 per semester."

Bustamante, who is an exercise science major, has spent upwards of $800 himself and claims the cost simply makes college unaffordable.

"A bunch of students are short on cash and they are bending over backwards," he said, "the book process is making college downright unaffordable."

Dozens of students wait in long lines to purchase high priced course books.

Bustamante and Napolitano have already begun negotiations with the administration and Follett. Follett, which does not currently offer any sort of rental system in any of the 700 schools that it represents, was not initially opposed to the idea of renting textbooks. The company had requested that students would need to use their UCards to access the system and that Follett would need SPIRE access to ensure that students were purchasing the correct textbooks for the correct courses.

Five years ago, it was the administrations responsibility to provide for the annex. Now, with a five-year contract, the administration has not had the responsibility or the liability of running the annex, and it is receiving an annual pay from Follett.

Several universities across the country currently use some sort of rental system with textbooks. Eastern Illinois University, a public school with about 10,000 students, has used a rental system ever since the school was established, back in 1898. A list of basic textbooks are available for renting and if students are unhappy with the cur-

Diana's crash: paparazzi let off

By Verana Von Derschau

PARIS — A Paris appeals court on Tuesday upheld the acquittals of three photographers accused of invasion of privacy after they took pictures of Princess Diana and Dodi Fayed at the scene of their deadly crash.

Jacques Langevin, Christian Martinez and Fabrice Chassery were first acquitted last November. Fayed's father, Egyptian-born billionaire Mohammed al Fayed, filed an appeal, which the Paris court rejected.

"Photos like that are taken everyday in every country in the world," said Langevin. "The judges were courageous. Justice has been done — for the moment."

His lawyer, Francois Stefanaggi, did not rule out that al Fayed might again seek to appeal. He said the ruling showed that photographers were not responsible for the famous couple's deaths.

"At this stage in the procedure, we can consider that there is no longer any reason to lump together the unfortunate accident that cost the lives of Diana Spencer and Dodi Fayed and the photographers' pictures," he said.

The three men, whose photos were confiscated and not published, were among the swarm of photographers who pursued the car carrying Diana and her boyfriend across Paris on Aug. 31, 1997, and took photos after it slammed into the pillar of a traffic tunnel.

The photos in question in the case showed Diana and Fayed leaving Paris' Ritz Hotel or after the crash.

At last year's trial, the court ruled that a crashed vehicle on a public highway is not a private area and said that anyone in the street where Diana and Fayed crashed could have seen them. It also said the couple knew they would be photographed when leaving the Ritz.

New Orleans residents bracing for Hurricane Ivan

By Doug Simpson
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — More than 1.2 million people in metropolitan New Orleans were warned to get out Tuesday as 140-mph Hurricane Ivan churned toward the Gulf Coast, threatening to submerge this below sea level city in what could be the most disastrous storm to hit in nearly 40 years.

Residents streamed inland in bumper-to-bumper traffic in an agonizingly slow exodus amid dire warnings that Ivan could overwhelm New Orleans with up to 20 feet of filthy, chemical polluted water. About three-quarters of a million more people along the coast in Florida, Mississippi and Alabama were also told to evacuate.

Forecasters said Ivan, a killer blamed for at least 68 deaths in the Caribbean, could reach 160 mph and strengthen to Category 5, the highest level, by the time it blows ashore as early as Thursday somewhere along the Gulf Coast.

"Hopefully the house will still be here when we get back," said Tara Chandra, a doctor at Tulane University in New Orleans who packed up his car, moved plants indoors and tried to book a Houston hotel room. Chandra said he wanted to ride out the storm, but his wife wanted to evacuate: "All the news reports are kind of freaking her out."

At nearly 200 miles wide, Ivan could cause significant damage no matter where it strikes. Officials ordered or strongly urged an estimated 1.9 million people to flee in a 330 mile danger zone stretching across four states, from Morgan City and New Orleans in Louisiana to St. Marks in the Florida Panhandle.

"I beg people on the coast: Do not ride this storm out," Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said, urging people in other parts of the state to open their homes to relatives, friends and co-workers.

As of 5 p.m., Ivan was about 370 miles southeast of the mouth of the Mississippi River, moving northwest at about 9 mph.

New Orleans, the nation's largest city below sea level, is particularly vulnerable to flooding, and Mayor Ray Nagin was among the first to urge residents to get out while they can. The city's Louis Armstrong Airport was ordered closed Tuesday night.

Up to 10 feet below sea level in spots, New Orleans sits between the nearly half mile wide Mississippi River and Rhode Island size Lake Pontchartrain, relying on a system of levees, canals and huge pumps to keep dry.

The city has not taken a major direct hit since Betsy in 1965, when an 8 to 10 foot storm surge submerged parts of the city in 7 feet of water. Betsy was blamed for 74 deaths in Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida.

Exerts said Ivan could be worse, sending water pouring over the levees, flooding to the rooftops and turning streets into a toxic brew of raw sewage, gas and chemicals from nearby refineries.

The mayor said that he would "aggressively recommend" people evacuate, but that it would difficult to order them to do so, because at least 100,000 in the city rely on public transportation and would have no way to leave. In addition, he said 10,000 people were in town for conventions, and there was nowhere for many of them to go except high floors in their hotels.

By midday Tuesday, traffic on Interstate 10, the major hurricane route out of New Orleans, was at a near standstill, and state police turned the interstate west of the city into a one way route out. U.S. Highway 59, the old major route between New Orleans and Baton Rouge, also was jammed.

In the French Quarter, businesses put up plywood and closed their shutters. A few people were still hanging out at Cafe du Monde, a favorite spot for French roast coffee and beignets, and a man playing a trombone outside had a box full of tips.

"They said get out, but I can't change my flight, so I figure I might as well enjoy myself," said George Senton, of Newark, N.J., who listened to the music. "At least I'll have had some good coffee and some good music before it gets me."

Tourist Dee Barkhart, a court reporter from Baltimore, was drinking Hurricane punches at Pat O'Brien's bar.

"I looked into earlier flights, but they were hundreds of dollars more and I wasn't sure I could switch flights," she said. "I figure I'm happier sitting here drinking hurricanes than sitting at the airport worrying about them."

But Barkhart's drinks would have to be for the road. The bar planned to close by nightfall.

Elsewhere along the Gulf Coast, thousands of residents, gamblers and tourists crowded northbound roads. Motels were booked as far north as Jackson, Miss., and Montgomery, Ala.

Mississippi regulators ordered a dozen casinos along the state's 75-mile long coast to close at noon Tuesday, but many gamblers pumped coins into the slot machines right up to closing.

"I don't worry about what's going to happen tomorrow. We can't control it anyway," said Ed Bak of Fairfield, Ohio, who dropped quarters into a machine at the President Casino.

In Alabama, Gov. Bob Riley ordered the evacuation of coastal resorts. "This is a serious storm that requires serious action to get people out of harm's way," he said.

Along Florida's Panhandle, the sounds of saws and drills filled the air as people put up boards to protect their homes and businesses.

"We are just hoping to still be here," said Matt Claxton, an assistant manager of a Perdido Key seafood restaurant as workers brought the patio furniture inside.

CIA training could take five years

By Katherine Pfleger Shrader
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee to head the CIA promised Tuesday to shed his political past and provide precise, objective and independent intelligence to the president and Congress. But he also cautioned it may take longer than the past CIA director's estimate to hire and train all the operatives needed worldwide to combat terrorism and other threats.

"I have made a commitment to nonpartisanship," retiring Rep. Porter Goss, R-Fla., told the Senate Intelligence Committee at his confirmation hearing. He conceded that during his 16 years in Congress he may "at times" have engaged in debate with too much vigor.

"Rest assured, however, I understand completely the difference in obligations the position of (director of central intelligence) carries with it and that which the role of a congressman carries," said Goss, who formerly chaired the House Intelligence Committee.

If confirmed, Goss would take over the agency just months after the CIA's last director, George Tenet, shocked some on the Sept. 11 commission by saying it would take five years to install the kind of clandestine service needed to deal with international terrorism. Tenet blamed the situation on tight budgets after the Cold War.

Goss, however, said Tuesday it would take more than five years to train and place all the clandestine operatives the CIA needs. "I don't believe five is enough," Goss said. "It's a long build-out, a long haul. It's been started."

Correction: The new legislation requiring college students to be immunized against meningococcal disease applies to all incoming graduate and undergraduate students, full or part time after August of 2005, not spring semester 2005.

All applicable students may sign a waiver refusing the immunization after they have received information about the risks and dangers of meningococcal disease. Currently the cost for the immunization is $75 at University Health Services; but the charges have not yet been set for the 2005-2006 school year. Students will need to check whether the cost can be reimbursed with their own health insurance plan.

Any students interested in receiving the vaccine now can simply call University Health Services (413) 577-5101 to book an appointment with an immunization nurse.

rent ones on reserve or wish to add another book onto the basic books list, they can do so by writing a request to the Director of the Textbook Rental Service.

From the University of Massachusetts alone, Follett rakes in nearly $6 million in revenue and the administration receives more than $800,000 annually.

A certain clause that is present in the contract clearly states that no other company can compete with Follett on campus grounds, which is exactly why "Books for Books" is a non-profit organization.

"Books for Books" run by MassPIRG, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group is a system in which students can bid on books that they need. For example, a student who has a biology book can call Books for Books and give a price, and then a student who wants to purchase that book can call and make an offer. Before any deal is finalized, the seller gets to approve the price.

MATTHEW REED/COLLEGIAN

Students wait in long lines at the Textbook Annex to purchase books.

"I want to encourage people to use Books for Books," Napolitano said, "you can buy them so much cheaper, but because of the anti-competitive clause, there can't be any other business competing on campus."

SGA plans to finalize their proposal and present it at the Faculty Senate meeting on Wednesday, Sept. 23 in hopes to make everyone aware of the current crisis.

"We want to show the administration that we're serious," Napolitano said, "but students really don't have a say, the administration will do what is best."

Bustamante and Napolitano believe that not only will students overwhelmingly like this idea, but also, faculty members as well. Professors often times tell students to purchase books at alternate book stores like Food For Though Books, CopyCat, and Jeffery Amherst Books for a variety of reasons.

"Faculty members solicit other places because they are slightly less expensive," Napolitano said, "and other simply boycott the annex because of ethnic concerns with using a huge corporation."

Both Bustamante and Napolitano hope that the University will not renew the contract with Follett; however, they both know that the administration is not looking to take over the Textbook Annex.

"I think that you should be able to rent books as long as you give them back in good condition at the end of the semester," Bustamante said, "people need to be aware that they can save a lot of money."

In his testimony, Goss also outlined a series of commonly cited priorities for the U.S. intelligence community. They included improving human intelligence and analytic capabilities, expanding intelligence sharing with state and local law enforcement agencies and enhancing foreign language capabilities.

A former Army intelligence and CIA clandestine officer, Goss would assume at a tumultuous time the helm of the CIA and the dual role as head of the 14 other agencies in the U.S. intelligence community.

At the Sept. 11 commission's recommendation, Congress and the White House are considering separating Goss' would-be position into two jobs — a CIA director and a national intelligence director. The commission said the latter position should be empowered with budget and personnel authority over all of the nation's spy network.

Goss has said he believes the authority to control budgets for foreign intelligence should be consolidated in a central office. But if confirmed, he said Tuesday, he will "play the cards that are dealt to me on this subject."

Bush has endorsed giving the new national intelligence director budgetary authority, but not all of the powers the commission suggested. Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry has endorsed adopting the commission's 40-plus recommendations in their entirety.

Even as Goss focused on substantive intelligence issues Tuesday, Democrats repeatedly returned to sometimes-terse exchanges about whether Goss could be an independent and non-political CIA chief.

The panel's top Democrat, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, admonished Goss for his criticism of Kerry, including a March op-ed piece he co-authored titled "Need Intelligence? Don't Ask John Kerry." Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said that Goss, as chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence from 1996 until August, was insufficiently committed to intelligence reform.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., also asked Goss about comments he made to The Associated Press about the prison abuse scandal in Iraq. During a May interview, Goss called ongoing Senate investigations "a circus."

"What you're saying by that comment is certainly a lack of respect not only for this committee, but this body," Feinstein said. "How can there be mutual respect?"

Goss said the comment was directed toward the "media frenzy" that was going on over the pictures of abuse at the now-infamous Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad.

"It was not made as a serious comment. It was not meant as a serious comment. It was not reported as a serious comment."

Lights out for Iraq; fire set to oil facility

By Jill Krane
Associated Press

KIRKUK, Iraq — Saboteurs wrecked a recently repaired pipeline junction Tuesday and the fire set off a cascade of power blackouts that underlined the frustrations faced by U.S. engineers trying to upgrade northern Iraq's creaky oil facilities in the face of relentless bombings.

The 3 a.m. attack blew up a junction where multiple oil pipelines cross the Tigris River in the northern city of Beiji. The burning oil melted power cables, causing a short that knocked power plants off line and cut off electricity across Iraq until late afternoon, officials said.

The breach also shut down the pipeline ferrying crude oil from Kirkuk's huge oilfield to an export terminal in Ceyhan, Turkey. With crude oil selling above $40 a barrel, the frequent sabotage has cost Iraq more than $2 billion, interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi has said.

"If you build it they will come - and try to blow it up," said Lt. Col. Lee Morrison, a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers officer who heads a Kirkuk-based oil security team. "It's definitely one step forward, one step back. You fix it and it blows up."

Instead of being sold on the international market, oil burned on the desert and poured, still aflame, into the Tigris. Aerial photos showed flaming slicks of oil floating downstream while black smoke billowed into mammoth columns visible 25 miles away.

Officials at the state-run North Oil Co. said the flames were extinguished late Tuesday.

Judge throws out guilty plea from drug company

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — A federal judge on Tuesday threw out the guilty plea of a former drug company employee who had admitted offering kickbacks to doctors who prescribed her company's medications. The ruling comes after a jury acquitted eight of her former colleagues of similar charges.

In December, former TAP Pharmaceutical Products district manager Kimberlee Chase pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Boston to conspiracy to defraud the government.

But the day after eight other defendants were acquitted in July after a threemonth trial, U.S. District Judge Douglas P. Woodlock wrote a memorandum to U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan and lawyers for Chase saying that the legal and factual grounds for accepting Chase's plea "were subject to substantial refinement."

At a hearing Tuesday, Woodlock said: "I'm not going to cling ... to the plea that I accepted at a time when I did not know as much as I know now."

The government's case against the TAP employees has been closely watched by the drug industry and the medical profession, which have been criticized for giving and receiving freebies. Critics say the practice drives up prescription drug prices and erodes public confidence in doctors.

Chase pleaded guilty to the conspiracy count against her, related to her offer of educational grants to Tufts HMO physicians in exchange for prescribing TAP drugs; the government agreed to drop some other counts against her.

Woodlock said Tuesday that Chase would still face on other counts.

No trial date was set.

In July, a jury acquitted all eight current and former employees of the Lake Forest, Ill.-based TAP of charges they offered doctors improper consulting fees, dinners, golf trips and other kickbacks to get them to prescribe certain drugs. Charges were dropped midtrial against three other employees. The company itself had settled with the government in 2001 for $875 million.

U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan's office said Chase's plea should not be changed.

"While Chase may consider it unfair that she, and she alone, stands convicted of the charge in Count One, that is not a sound basis upon which to permit her to withdraw her plea," prosecutor Michael K. Loucks wrote.

Loucks and attorneys for Chase refused comment after the hearing.

Peterson's clothes yield no evidence

By Brian Skoloff
Associated Press

REDWOOD CITY, Calif. — No blood was found on any of the tattered clothing from Laci Peterson's remains, a prosecution witness testified Tuesday at Scott Peterson's double-murder trial.

Pin Kyo, a state Department of Justice criminalist, said she scanned Laci Peterson's clothing for blood after her body was pulled from San Francisco Bay. Kyo previously testified that little blood was found in the Peterson home.

Prosecutors have not said how they believe Peterson killed his pregnant wife, and the body was too decomposed to determine a cause of death. Prosecutors are trying to prove Peterson killed his wife on or around Dec. 24, 2002, then dumped her weighted body into the bay.

The bodies of Laci Peterson and her fetus washed up along the bay in April 2003 not far from the Berkeley Marina, where Scott Peterson says he launched his boat that Christmas Eve morning for a solo fishing trip.

Kyo said she also tested twine-like material taken from around the fetus' neck. Showing a picture of the twine to jurors, prosecutor Dave Harris asked her about what appeared to be a small loop tied off with a knot.

"The way it's tied is very loosely," Kyo said.

Defense lawyers have claimed Laci was abducted, and that the child was born alive and then murdered. They have hinted that they believe the twine was intentionally tied around its neck.

Kyo also testified that the duct tape found on Laci's remains did not match duct tape discovered near where her body washed ashore, and that no tissue or blood was found on a large tarp-like piece of plastic found nearby.

Defense lawyers have implied the plastic and the duct tape may have had some connection to Laci's body.

On Monday, Kyo told jurors that she found no blood on two mops and a bucket seized from the Petersons' home. Prosecutors have implied Scott Peterson used the mops to clean the murder scene, but have presented no evidence to support that theory.

Kyo also testified no blood was found on several other items, including a blue tarp and Peterson's boat cover.

Kyo later said tiny specks of blood were found on the Petersons' comforter cover, but didn't elaborate. A source close to the case later told The Associated Press that DNA testing indicated the blood came from Scott Peterson.

Iraqi guerrilla fighting kills 59

By Kim Housego
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Guerrillas bombed a Baghdad shopping street full of police recruits and fired on a police van north of the capital Tuesday in attacks that killed at least 59 people and struck at the heart of the U.S. strategy for fighting Iraq's escalating insurgency.

The car bombing and shooting — the latest in violence that has killed nearly 150 people in three days — were part of an increasingly brazen and coordinated campaign to bring the battle to Baghdad, sowing chaos in the center of authority for Prime Minister Ayad Allawi and his American allies.

Insurgents appear to have only grown deadlier since Allawi's interim government took power in June, despite U.S. claims that Iraqi security forces are showing more resolve against insurgents.

The mounting attacks aim to wreck the centerpiece of the U.S. plan for defeating the militants: building a strong Iraqi security force able to bring some calm before elections slated for January. Doing so is also a key prerequisite for any withdrawal of American troops.

The Tawhid and Jihad group, headed by Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, posted a Web statement claiming responsibility for Tuesday's car bombing. The al-Qaida-linked group launched a surprise assault in Baghdad on Sunday, killing dozens, and boasted it had the upper hand in the fight against the Americans.

Tuesday evening, another loud explosion rocked Baghdad near the Green Zone, where Iraq's interim government and the U.S. Embassy are located. There was no immediate word on the cause.

The morning car bombing was the deadliest single attack in Baghdad in six months, wrecking buildings and cars on central Haifa Street, leaving charred bodies and hurling body parts, shoes and debris into nearby trees and homes.

The blast ripped through stores where Iraqis were shopping and cafes where men applying for the police force were sipping tea and escaping the summer heat as they waited their turn to sign up at the nearby western Baghdad police headquarters.

The 47 dead included would-be police recruits and civilians. At least 114 people were wounded, Health Ministry spokesman Saad Al-Amili said.

In Baqouba, northeast of the capital, gunmen in two cars opened fire Tuesday on a van carrying policemen, killing 11 officers and a civilian, said Qaisar Hamid of Baqouba General Hospital.

Also Tuesday, clashes between U.S. troops and insurgents killed at least eight civilians and wounded 18 in Ramadi, a predominantly Sunni Muslim city west of the capital where anti-American sentiments are high.

The military said Tuesday that three American soldiers were killed and eight wounded in separate attacks in Iraq in the past 24 hours.

Further highlighting the chaotic situation, electricity was knocked out across the country when saboteurs blew up an oil pipeline junction in northern Iraq, sparking a fire that set off a chain reaction in power generation systems.

In Cairo, the head of the Arab League warned that "the gates of hell are open in Iraq and the situation is getting more complicated and tense." Amr Moussa appealed to Arab countries "to help Iraq to overcome this crisis."

Despite the violence, U.S. and Iraqi forces claimed two successes in recent days. U.S. troops on Tuesday ended their siege of the northwest city of Tal Afar, saying they had cleared it of militants after 12 days of fighting that killed dozens of people.

And on Thursday, U.S. troops entered Samarra, north of Baghdad, for the first time since May 30 after negotiating a deal with local leaders. The city had been a stronghold of Sunni insurgents.

U.S. commanders insisted attacks like Tuesday's won't deter Iraqis from joining the police and Iraqi national guard to help end the violence.

"I'm pretty sure that it's not driving them away, it may in fact have the opposite reaction and strengthen their resolve to join the Iraqi forces," said Lt. Col. Steven Boylan, spokesman for coalition forces in Iraq. "They are tired of the killings and the bombings."

Crowds at the scene of the Baghdad explosion pumped their fists in the air and directed their anger against the United States and Allawi for failing to protect the station even though police recruiting points have repeatedly been attacked.

"Bush is a dog," they chanted.

"Such places were targeted before," said Ali Abul-Amir, who had been waiting to join the police force. "I blame Ayad Allawi's government for what happened because they did not take the necessary security measures."

With medical teams overwhelmed, residents covered burned bodies with blankets and lay them on stretchers. Others collected severed hands, arms and legs and put them into cardboard boxes.

"Seconds earlier, people were drinking tea or eating sandwiches and then I could see their remains hanging from trees," said Mahdi Mohammed, who was outside his barber shop when the explosion went off. "I could see burning people running in all directions."

Some directed their anger at the militants.

"Such acts cannot be considered part of the resistance (against American forces). This is not a jihad, they are not mujahedeen," said Amir Abdel Hassan, a teacher. "Iraq is not a country, it's a big graveyard," he said.

With Allawi in power and January elections approaching, U.S. commanders have said they are stepping up the training and arming of Iraq's security forces.

The U.S. military has been training Iraqi police and the Iraqi Civil Defense Corps members for more than 18 months. But over the summer, the Army officer formerly in charge of training, Maj. Gen. Paul D. Easton, acknowledged that misguided U.S. methods had wasted almost a year.

The forces' weakness were highlighted in April, when police largely abandoned their stations in the face of an uprising by Shiite militiamen in Baghdad and southern cities. When the militia rose up again last month, U.S. forces did most of the fighting.

Workers writing skills not up to workplace standards

By Maddlen Read
Associated Press

NEW YORK — It's not just students who need to brush up on their writing.

A majority of U.S. employers say about one-third of workers do not meet the writing requirements of their positions, according to a survey by the College Board's National Commission on Writing.

"Businesses are really crying out — they need to have people who write better," said College Board President Gaston Caperton.

While writing has always held a spot in American education as one of the three Rs, many say writing clearly and accurately is more important than ever — and not all workers are up to the task.

In a fast-paced workplace, precision and brevity are essential. For e-mails, reports and presentations, the commission found that accuracy, clarity, spelling, punctuation, grammar and conciseness ranked among the most sought-after skills.

"There's no way to say that writing has gotten worse," said Susan Traiman, director of the education initiative for the Business Roundtable. Rather, "the demand has gotten greater."

The commission surveyed Business Roundtable members in six sectors — mining; construction; manufacturing; transportation and utilities; services; and finance, insurance and real estate.

Two-thirds of salaried workers in large U.S. companies have jobs that require some writing — and this includes some of the most technical occupations.

"Writing skills tend to be critical more on the salaried side of things, but even for our hourly jobs, to be able to communicate shift to shift," said Thomas Siegele, a human resources manager for paint and glass maker PPG Industries Inc., based in Pittsburgh.

William Raney, president of the industry group West Virginia Coal Association, said writing skills are necessary for such varied groups as electricians, engineers and foremen, who often draft proposals for government agencies and regulatory bodies.

"There's a great need to translate the technical to the practical," Raney said.

A majority of survey respondents said about two-thirds of employees — both current workers and new hires — meet writing requirements. While lackluster writing skills do not necessarily impede success in all realms, more than half of the companies surveyed reported that they assess writing in hiring and promoting salaried employees.

The solution?

The College Board, which administers the SAT, PSAT and Advanced Placement tests, says the responsibility lies with grade schools and universities — but training represents another potential solution.

Europeans ignore warnings of nuclear program in Iran

By George Jahon
Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — A U.S.-European rift surfaced Tuesday over how harshly to deal with Iran and its suspect nuclear program, with the Europeans ignoring American suggestions and circulating their own recommendations to other delegates at a key meeting of the U.N. atomic agency.

Diplomats at a board of governors meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency had suggested earlier that the United States and the European Union were making progress in drafting common language for a resolution that would set a deadline for Iran to meet demands designed to dispel fears it was trying to make nuclear arms.

But the latest draft, obtained by The Associated Press and being circulated informally Tuesday for reaction from other delegations, was nearly exactly the one that France, Britain and Germany came up with Friday — a text that U.S. officials had said would be unacceptable.

The American suggestions also were made available to the AP. They demand Iran grant agency inspectors "complete, immediate and unrestricted access;" provide "full information" about past illegal nuclear activities; suspend "immediately and fully" uranium enrichment and related activities; and meet all agency demands to "resolve all outstanding issues" nurturing suspicions of a possible weapons program.

The IAEA meeting has become the main battleground between Iran and Washington, which wants to take Iran before the U.N. Security Council for alleged violations of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

A U.S. official who demanded anonymity denied the developments were a blow to Washington.

"Not everybody is happy but not everybody is going to be happy" with the U.S. insistence on a harsh line on Iran, he told the AP. "I think things are moving in our direction."

The Americans asked the draft include an Oct. 31 deadline. The EU text remained vaguer in demands and in a time frame, asking only that IAEA director general Mohamed ElBaradei submit a comprehensive report before November for evaluation by the board.

ElBaradei shrugged off the idea of a deadline.

"We cannot just say there is a magic date," for an end to his agency's Iran probe, he said. He also repeated that his investigation has not definitely established whether Iran is trying to make nuclear arms — as Washington asserts.

"We haven't seen any concrete proof that there is a weapons program," ElBaradei told reporters on the second day of the board meeting. "Can we say everything is peaceful? Obviously we are not at that stage."

Revelations of the rift were expected to prove embarrassing to the Americans. They had expressed confidence they would be able to win over the Europeans and had flown in a team close to U.S. Undersecretary of State John Bolton for the board meeting — effectively sidelining the Vienna-based U.S. mission that usually handles such conferences.

The Americans "introduced amendments that were beyond what the market would bear," said one senior Western diplomat who tracks the IAEA. "The European draft is right now going to have support."

Bolton, the U.S. point-man on nuclear nonproliferation, is considered tough on Iran by most European delegations at the board meeting in the Austrian capital. The diplomat suggested the Washington team "doesn't perhaps have a good sense of what the Vienna audience can accept."

A diplomat representing one of the 25 EU countries said part of the problem was that the Americans came in with modifications after the European Union thought they were happy with the original draft written by France, Germany and Britain.

"We thought we had something with the Americans and they came in with further amendments," said the diplomat, who, like others, spoke to the AP on condition of anonymity.

Asselin loses primary

By Jennifer Peter
Associated Press

BOSTON — Democratic Rep. Christopher Asselin of Springfield, who was indicted on federal corruption charges along with eight members of his family earlier this summer, lost a lopsided primary battle to lawyer Sean Curran in Tuesday's election.

He appeared to be one of the few incumbent lawmakers unable to withstand intraparty challenges. At least 14 other Democratic House incumbents held on to their seats Tuesday as results in 57 primaries began trickling in.

In Suffolk County, Sheriff Andrea Cabral won the most hotly contested primary race, beating City Councilor Stephen Murphy and ensuring herself a new six-year term in office. Cabral, who was appointed to the post in 2002, faces no Republican opposition in November. She is the state's first female sheriff.

Curran — who faces no Republican opponent in the general election - pulled in 53 percent of the vote to Asselin's 15 percent, while a third candidate, Rosemarie Mazza-Moriarty, was shown with 31 percent of the votes.

Curran said it was not Asselin's indictment but voters' desire for a new representative as Springfield tries to claw its way out of a multimillion-dollar budget gap.

"The focus of my campaign was to turn around the economic condition of Springfield," Curran said. "The major issue in this race was how best do we tackle our economic crisis."

Asselin did not immediately return calls for comment.

Some voters said, however, that it was the indictment that steered their decision.

"I wouldn't vote for someone who's been arrested," said Larry Turcotte, an 80-year-old retired optician voting at Our Lady of Hope in Springfield.

Asselin was among 13 people charged with bilking about $1 million from the Springfield Housing Authority. Charges included racketeering, conspiracy, bribery, mail fraud, extortion, money laundering and witness tampering. The Asselins have pleaded innocent.

With 72 percent of the precincts reporting in the closely watched sheriff race in Worcester County, state Sen. Guy Glodis was shown with 69 percent of the vote over 17-year incumbent Sheriff John Flynn's 31 percent.

The winner will face Republican William McCarthy of Worcester in the November general elections.

A slim turnout of voters took to the polls across Massachusetts, casting ballots in dozens of primaries that will determine the final lineup for November's general election. There were primary battles in all but 22 of the state's 351 cities and towns, but the lack of a marquee statewide race translated into a low turnout in many districts throughout the day.

The primary ballots featuring 38 legislative races - five in the Senate and 33 in the House.

The Suffolk sheriff's race drew Connie Dossantos to the polls early at a senior housing complex in the Boston's Jamaica Plain neighborhood.

The 37-year-old saleswoman said the light turnout didn't bother her; she just wanted to be sure she supported Cabral.

"We need more women in politics," said Dossantos. "She's been doing a great job."

But Harold Knight, 36, was frustrated that so few races were contested, especially since the state faces so many important issues.

"The fact that these races are unopposed makes the process less than it should be," said Knight, who is unemployed.

The most high-profile Senate race will determine the Democratic candidate to take on Republican James Coffey in the contest to fill the seat vacated by Sen. David Magnani, D-Framingham. State Rep. Karen Spilka, D-Ashland, faced fellow Democrats Gerard Desilets and Adam Sisitsky, both of Framingham.

Democrat Angus McQuilken was up against three other candidates in his attempt to force a rematch with Republican Sen. Scott Brown, who won a special election against McQuilken earlier this year to fill a vacancy in the Norfolk, Bristol and Middlesex District.

In Leominster, the race to determine a successor to Democratic Rep. Mary Jane Simmons, who died earlier this month, was finalized. Her former aide, Democrat Jennifer Flanagan, won a four-way Democratic primary for the seat while Republican David Nault won a two-way Republican primary.

Textbook rental a step in the right direction

Every year it seems that the cost of books becomes an increasingly large problem for students who are doing their best to get by. As students drop $500 and more each semester on books they may never use again, they pick up second jobs just to be sure they can cover the rising costs and still have enough money to enjoy themselves.

Finally, this issue is being addressed. The contract the University has with eFollett, our current textbook provider, will expire this upcoming summer and the Student Government Association has proposed a system that would focus more on students' needs. Implementing a textbook rental system, as they have suggested, would drastically cut back on the amount of money each student must spend in a semester.

As part of their plan, students would have a supplemental fee ranging from $100 to $150 added to their bill, which would then allow them access to the textbook rental center where theoretically all of their books would be available for the entire semester.

The proposal is definitely a step in the right direction, focusing the University's attention on the needs of those for whom it is supposed to exist. However, the concept seems too good to be true and there are many things to discuss before any action can be taken.

The first issue to take into consideration would be the condition of rented textbooks. Currently, the books available used books have only been previously owned by a minimal amount of people and are generally in good condition. But in a system where the books are changing hands every semester, if not several times a semester, how will we be guaranteed that our books will remain in usable condition?

Another concern is the supplemental fee. If it is automatically added to all of our bills, and all of our textbooks really are available, then it will certainly be an improvement. But in order to assure that students will not have to spend additional money on books that aren't available, a system will have to be in place that will assure students they can get their books when they need them. Making the fee optional for students would at least allow for the freedom to purchase our books on our own if we so choose.

It is uncharted territory as far as UMass is concerned and so there are bound to be flaws to this solution. There are many details that will need to be worked out, and many kinks that will arise in the beginning if such a system is ever approved. But one thing is certain: it is a necessary step to putting the students at this university first. We should not have to continue spending over a thousand dollars a year on the tools with which we learn, just so an outside, independent source can reap the benefits.

Action in Sudan is needed

One need look no further than the heated political and moral arguments about the United States led intervention in Iraq to see that forceful involvement in the affairs of a distant nation is not something that should be undertaken lightly.

Using the military force of a superpower like the United States to dictate which political regimes and policies are acceptable in foreign, ostensibly sovereign nations invites questions about diplomatic honesty and imperialistic motives.

However, there are times when the need for immediate foreign intervention by any means necessary clearly outweighs these concerns.

Germany, Cambodia, Kosovo and Rwanda are just four recent examples of the human animal at its worst. In addition to innumerable rapes, assaults, and instances of torture, millions of innocent men, women, and children have been killed by state-sanctioned genocide in the past seventy years.

It is beyond question that every head of state in the world would have intervened more quickly and more decisively in each of the examples mentioned above if they had known at the time what we know now. And yet, in Sudan today more than a million people have been killed, raped or forced to live in refugee camps because of their ethnicity, and still no significant international action has been taken.

The conflict in Sudan began in early 2003, when rebels from the nation's western Darfour region began attacking government targets to protest what they felt was unfair treatment by the government in Khartoum. Specifically, the black rebel groups felt that the oil-rich, ethnic-minority controlled government was favoring Arab Sudanese, at the expense of black African Sudanese.

Ethnic tension is nothing new for the east African nation, which has been at war with itself along north-south geographic lines off and on for most of its independence. It has seen tribal conflicts over grazing land in Darfour and elsewhere, dating back centuries.

In this case, however, the initial rebel insurgency was not met with a formal declaration of war or with focused military resistance, but rather with the formation of government-supported ethnic militias. The Sudanese government in Khartoum admits to forming militias for self-defense, but denies any connection to the most notorious militia to be formed since the Darfour rebellion, the Janjaweed.

The Janjaweed are a group of armed Muslim Arabs who have been accused of the committing most of the worst atrocities of the conflict that has left up to 50,000 dead and approximately 1.4 million homeless. Both of the black African rebel groups, the Sudan Liberation Army and Justice and Equality Movement, have also been accused of committing ethnically-motivated atrocities, but it has become clear that the Janjaweed is better armed and supported and has therefore committed the bulk of the atrocities.

Thomas Craven

It has also become increasingly clear that the government's claims to have had nothing to do with the formation or support of the Janjaweed are false. Eyewitness reports indicate that government helicopters frequently provide air support before or during Janjaweed raids, and it seems unlikely that the Janjaweed armed itself without assistance from the government. The story of Idris Abu Moussa, a 26-year-old Sudanese farmer quoted on darfurgenocide.org, supports these claims.

According to Moussa, "They came at 4 a.m. on horseback, on camels, in vehicles, with two helicopters overhead ... they killed 50 people in my village. My father, grandmother, uncle and two brothers were all killed. ... They don't want any blacks left."

Other refugee accounts make clear that the Janjaweed is bent on ethnic cleansing, killing black African men, raping women, and stealing whatever they like from entire villages. Many female refugees report having been abducted and held as sex slaves for more than a week by Janjaweed riders. Meanwhile, both villagers whose homes have been destroyed and those who simply fear for their lives are abandoning Darfour in droves. Estimates have put the number of refugees at 1.4 million, as many as 200,000 of whom have camped out across the border in neighboring Chad.

The bordering region of Chad is ethnically similar to that of Darfour, and many fear that the conflict will spread. In the refugee camps, thousands are at risk of dying from malnutrition or a host of other diseases, many of which are due to the lack of potable water. Children are especially at risk, and thousands have likely already died because of the poor conditions. The Janjaweed reportedly patrol the borders of the refugee camps and kill men and rape women who venture too far in search of water or firewood.

It is thought that the Sudanese government likely initially supported the Janjaweed militias because they neutralized the rebel groups and served as an example to other volatile regions of the nation, that rebellion would gain them nothing. It has further been speculated that the government in Khartoum felt that the international community would not intervene because the United States and its coalition were already spread too thin in Iraq and would not be willing to commit troops to another possibly unpopular war so soon before an election.

Unfortunately, the government's gamble seems to be paying off, as international intervention has been very slow in coming. The European Union set a deadline for the disarmament of militias threatening refugees, which has since passed, but at present the EU is still only threatening sanctions.

The United States, especially Secretary of State Colin Powell, has recently used more forceful language regarding the situation in Sudan, saying that it is genocide. According to the United Nations charter, if the Darfour conflict were recognized as genocide the United Nations would legally have to send an intervention force. And yet, after 50,000 deaths and many more rapes and personal tragedies, the only peacekeeping force currently in Sudan is a group of some 300 Rwandan African Union troops.

While it is true that the government has recently issued statements condemning the Janjaweed, and after international pressure has finally begun to make it a little easier for non-political aid groups to reach the refugee camps, the actions of the government in Khartoum have already shown that it is not viable and must be replaced immediately.

Quite simply, the possibility that the government of Africa's largest nation is a deadly, racist, power and oil obsessed cabal that has infringed on its citizens' basic human rights in ways that cannot be tolerated has become too great to ignore. Whether or not it is the international community's responsibility to introduce democracy, it is undoubtedly the responsibility of all who are able to intervene to put an end to genocide.

As a stopgap, the most intelligent plan seems to be a neutral force of 30,000 troops, one-third from the Sudanese government, one-third from the rebels, and one-third from the African Union. This group must be funded by wealthy nations like the United States, and it must be enacted quickly. People are dying in Sudan now, and it is not acceptable that best the international community can do is to debate possible sanctions and observe diplomatic protocol as lives are lost, women are raped, and children grow up malnourished. If we have learned anything from Rwanda, it must be that the risks of acting too late far outweigh the possible repercussions of rushing in too soon.

Oppressed by fear

S.J. Port

You are only allowed to go outside during clear daylight hours; dusk and dawn do not constitute daylight hours. During the winter these hours (in New England approximately eight a day, from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.) are especially limited. However, you are expected to obey the aforementioned rule.

It is suggested that you not walk alone in areas of low pedestrian traffic, such as alleys, side streets, parking lots, your back yard or driveway.

Furthermore, it is not advised that you ever live alone. This is especially true in densely populated areas, like cities, and economically disadvantaged areas. Supposing that you choose to live alone, doing so risks your own safety at a much higher rate than your peers who live with partners, or roommates. To decrease this risk, it is advised you keep an imposing (and thus protective) canine pet.

Clothing should be carefully chosen to not elicit any undesirable attention, or worse, especially when out after sundown. Also remember, regardless of clothing choice, after the sun has set you must be accompanied by an appropriate chaperone.

Regardless of the hour of day, if your car breaks down, do not allow anyone who helpfully pulls over to assist you, unless they are a uniformed police officer. That said, question even the police officer; they to might have ulterior motives or expect unlawful compensation for their aid.

Do not go to the bathroom alone; this is an area of high risk for your kind. Take comrades to the toilet with you.

Do not travel alone; you will be taken advantage of.

If you do not follow the aforementioned recommendations you run the risk of incurring violence upon your person. If violent actions are taken against you, because you have not stuck to the above guidelines, responsibility for said violence will fall partly on your shoulders.

Consider yourself oppressed by the fear of violence: welcome to womanhood.

As young adolescents, daughters are often more restricted by parents than their sons of equal ages. The female gender is raised to believe it is at risk, more vulnerable to assault, and less able to protect itself.

As a female freshman, you hear of a friend, or even a nameless peer, who was assaulted in the bathroom four doors down from your bedroom — the same bathroom you use when the pressure of a full bladder wakes you at 3 a.m. — and that instance of fear sticks with you. The bathroom is added to your running mental list of places that are not safe for women to be at certain times of the night or day.

If your car breaks down, do not allow anyone who helpfully pulls over to assist you, unless they are a uniformed police officer.

One evening this summer, five female friends went out to a bar. Dressed for a girl's night out (meaning there was less focus on revealing skin) the five returned home around 1 a.m. On the 20-minute walk home, through what is considered a safe, small city, the five women encountered constant catcalls from men on the sidewalk and from across the road as they walked.

One group of young fellows followed the five women for about a quarter of a mile repeatedly asking why the five females didn't want to stop and "talk." Eventually, the men found a group of women on their side of the street who were stopped and took interest in them, leaving our heroines to endure only catcalls from static figures on the remainder of their walk home.

Women are raised to feel fear when alone in a questionable situation; all five were surprised to feel fear as a rather solid pack traveling together for the very reason of protection.

The men who followed these five women may have actually only wanted to talk; they might be well-rounded, charming fellows with a few too many beers in them. Men who most nights tuck baby sisters into bed with a hug and a lullaby. That night, however, they scared five women.

Violence against women is an issue of both safety and fear. Women are imprisoned by the learned fear of male violence against women. Whether or not the fear is imbedded in reality, it is a mindset we have absorbed from both the women and men who want to protect us. Statistically, the terror is valid, and socially too often disrespected by men.

Men who do not threaten the safety of women, and in their own relationships are both protective and respectful, often feel no responsibility for male violence. They also, often pooh-pooh their female friends safety fears. These doting boyfriends, brothers, fathers, friends, etc. have taken a personal stand. However, a personal stand is not enough.

All men and women are responsible for violence against women. Standing by and watching your friend talk to the girl who is too drunk to make coherent decisions is allowing violence against women to potentially happen.

I do not know any men that I believe would violate a woman's safety. But I do know men who could have stopped a situation and did not. It is your business, because violence against women affects men directly: it changes how women live and how they relate to men. In order to nullify the female fear of male violence, all men must take an active stand to protect women.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NEW CHANCELLOR ENCOURAGES STUDENTS TO VOTE

I am excited to be the new Chancellor of Elections this year. I look forward to running a great election for the Senate. Student government is one of the most important aspects of student life here on campus, and I encourage anyone and everyone who wishes to get involved to do so. Being a senator is a significant role in building and shaping student life and our quality of life on campus. For those of you who do not have the time nor interest to take such an active role, please remember to vote — it only takes a second, and it has a significant impact in our community.

The Senate election will take place Wednesday September 29 and Thursday September 30 at the Dining Commons and the Campus Center concourse. Nomination papers can be picked up in the SGA office, 422 Student Union Building, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., beginning today, September 15. Nomination papers are due on Tuesday, September 21 in the SGA office, by 5 p.m. with at least 25 signatures. For any questions call 545-5411.

Good luck to everyone and remember to vote!

Vicki Bronshteyn
Chancellor of Elections

A CALL TO ALL SOUTHWEST RESIDENTS

With the first full week of classes coming to an end, many students will be looking to have a fun, relaxing and enjoyable weekend ahead. In addition to catching up with old and new friends, going to a few parties, or catching a movie, many students will be tuned in to the Red Sox/Yankees three game series both this and next weekend. Given the history of this rivalry, the executive board of the Southwest Area Government, your elected representatives, urges all Southwest residents to enjoy this series in a safe, celebratory, and non-destructive manner.

In addition to planning numerous social events for southwest students, Southwest Area Government is committed to representing our constituents in the best light to the rest of the campus and to the administration. We are only able to do this, to the best of our abilities, when we can show the enormous amount of intelligence, talent, and skill that our constituents embody.

It is for this reason that I implore all Southwest residents to be responsible in their form of celebrations during the upcoming weekends and for the rest of the school year. Together we can prove that the Southwest Residential Area is the best living area on campus, and we can all be proud to be a part of this wonderful community.

Resident Evil: Apocalypse

Sexy heroines can't save sequel from weak plot

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The gleaming high tech Metropolis at the center of "Resident Evil: Apocalypse" is called Raccoon City, and it's such an inexplicable, what-the-hell moniker that it almost fits the bombastic simplicity of a movie that has nothing more on it's mind that blowing away some zombies real good.

A noisy and hectic sequel to the 2002 hit based on the videogame, the movie features an array of ugly ghouls — there are mottled-skin undead folks, zombie Dobermans with bleeding lesions and a trio of hulking monstrosities with five foot long tongues — but they carry no mystery or menace; the movie is more concerned with its arsenal of explosions and automatic weapons to bother scaring us.

'Resident Evil: Apocalypse'
Directed by Alexander Witt
Starring Milla Jovovich, Sienna Guillory

"Resident Evil: Apocalypse" isn't a good movie, but it's a fast and juicy piece of trash. The script is by the first film's director Paul W.S. Anderson, who went on to do "Alien vs. Predator" — and it's filled with inane clunkers like "I'm good, but not that good," while the characters — assorted commandos and civilians trying to make it out of the contaminated Raccoon City — are barely given even a half a dimension to work with. There are a pair of sexy female heroes, lead by the inexpressive Ukrainian model Milla Jovovich, and a minimal plot that exists only as a shoehorn for the double-fisted weapons fire.

I wish Witt hadn't directed so many of the action scenes with a quick-cut blur, but the movie, for all it's artlessness, is by far better than the first film, which was too much of a limp "Alien" knock-off. Thank the heavens — or the yeoman designers of a slick guilty pleasure for small favors.

Science experiments go terribly wrong in Director Alexander Witt's "Resident Evil: Apocalypse"

Milla Jovovich shows big guns as the film's hero, "Alice," in the recent blockbuster.

Q: Help! I have a housemate from hell! We're renting an off-campus apartment (we signed a lease together in June) but things are NOT working out. She has big parties and smokes in the house (despite our agreement that she would only smoke outside). My other housemates can't stand her. She didn't contribute her share of the rent this month and says she's moving out next week. My housemates and I can't afford to pay all the rent. What should we do? — Fearful on Fearing Street

A: Dear Fearful — Don't fear. With some negotiation and creativity, you can solve this problem. But first, the legal facts:

Most leases make multiple tenants (you and your housemates) "jointly and severally" responsible for rent. That means that all of you are responsible for each other's share of the rent. The landlord could collect the entire rent from just one of you — he or she doesn't care how the rent is divided, or where it comes from.

If your lease says that you are "jointly and severally" liable for rent payments, the landlord can try to collect the entire rent from you and your other housemates alone.

Leases are complex documents with serious implications. Housemate relations can create touchy situations. The two combined create a potent cocktail of choices and consequences. Your rights largely depend upon the written lease, which usually reserves most of the decision making power to – guess who? The landlord. However, if you have a good relationship with your landlord, you may be able to negotiate a solution and be rid of your hellish housemate.

Do you want a substitute housemate to start sharing rent payments immediately? If so, I'd recommend this approach: begin by impressing on housemate from hell that she is legally bound to pay rent, whether she stays or not. After all, her name is on the lease. (If she replies that she's sticking you with the bill, tell her (politely) that you can sue her in Small Claims Court for the amount she owes. You can also mention that if you can't pay because of her defection, the landlord will be delighted to come after her as well.)

She may re-think her move and offer to continue paying rent while you locate her replacement. But here's where it gets sticky: many leases don't permit tenant substitutions or subletting without the written permission of the landlord. Landlords want to make sure that the new tenant is creditworthy and responsible. Bring your lease to SLSO so that an attorney can determine the viability of the substitution option.

Choose a "model" housemate who can gain your landlord's favor too. Then, open a dialogue with your landlord. Experienced landlords should be flexible, since your situation is all-too common. Make your request politely, verbally and in writing. Explain the reasons for the substitution and why the new housemate should be added to the lease. You might also point out that you'd be getting rid of a smoker and a partier.

A wise landlord should consider your request. After all, if you are unable to pay your rent, she will have to start eviction proceedings and pursue your parents, if they guarantee the lease (assuming you have one) — a costly and time-consuming activity.

If your landlord agrees to the switch, make sure your new housemate's name gets on the lease. If you don't, and the new housemate goes south, you'll find yourself without a legal remedy against her.

Other resolutions may be possible. Come in to SLSO for a consultation. By examining the terms of the lease, we may be able to find other legal solutions. In fact, before doing anything, make an appointment with a legal assistant at the SLSO for free legal advice by calling 545-1995, or visiting Room 922 in the Campus Center. Good luck!

'Sonic Youth' still in top form

Old School Rockers breath life with new album

By Nick Romanow
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When your band's name is Sonic Youth and you're over twenty years into your career, one can assume that there is a lot of pressure on you to keep things fresh. It really should be no surprise though, that Sonic Youth has had no problem maintaining their throne at the top of the art-rock pile.

On their latest, (19th album for those who are keeping track), "Sonic Nurse" — the band continues to go in the direction of 2002's "Murray Street," which found them becoming even more song orientated then ever before, while also strongly retaining the atmosphere and fondness for experimentation from their classic albums such as "Daydream Nation". Not that you'll be hearing Sonic Youth on commercial radio anytime soon, but songs like the opener "Pattern Recognition" are more accessible then a lot of Sonic Youth's earlier material.

Sonic Youth — 'Sonic Nurse' — Geffen Records

But fear not long time fans — "Sonic Nurse" is still made by the same band that recent rock history has come to know and love. There are long passages of twisting; mesmerizing feedback, droning in many songs and of course, Sonic Youth maintains the effortless cool that has practically become their trademark. If anything, Sonic Youth has become even cooler.

"Dripping Dream" comes to a crossroads where it could simply explode into a violent epic but guitarist/vocalist Thurston Moore keeps his cool while a guitar begins to fuzz quietly beneath his gentle lead line. "I Love You Golden Blue" which seems to run from a hazy soundscape and turn into an atmospheric epic.

Bassist/vocalist Kim Gordon has more to do vocally on "Sonic Nurse" then she has had on other albums and she makes the most of it. "Kim Gordon and the Arthur Doyle Hand Cream" finds Gordon barely restraining the seething energy of the music and her own voice. The track shows the band having so much fun that the song threatens to become a roll-the-windows-down summer song.

Lyrically the album is extremely diverse. The band jumps from the subtle to the serious to the political to the cheeky. "...Hand Cream" originally had Mariah Carey's name in place of Gordon's in the title and, as one would gather from that, the song is a tongue-in-cheek ode to the nervous-breakdown diva.

"Dude Ranch Nurse," another Gordon-penned song, is cryptic and mysterious and when she sings, "Let the nurse give you a shot" it sounds more like a threat then anything else. "Paper Cup Exit" and "Peace Attack" are, like many of the songs on this album, jabs at George W. Bush. Most of the lyrics are so subtle in fact that listeners unfamiliar with the band's political behavior (or their many songs that attacked George H.W. Bush) probably won't even notice the message behind them.

In many ways, though, that is the beauty of Sonic Youth. The band most certainly still knows how to rock out, but they have become even more comfortable with subtleties and atmosphere. Usually some form of noise backs a quiet guitar riff and bass line, and in some cases the noise will build and build until the song becomes a noise-rock freak out; but in most songs the band tames the music. They wield power over what should be overwhelming noise and keep it under their control. "Sonic Nurse" finds the band refusing to rely on old tricks, and instead pushing themselves even further to do things they haven't done.

Sonic Youth is at their best when they are trying new things, but not necessarily forcing themselves. "Sonic Nurse" is not their most original album, but it is still nowhere near formulaic. The reason why Sonic Youth can still sound, well, young, is because the band has an intricate type of looseness to match their seemingly effortless tightness. "Sonic Nurse" shows a mature band that still knows how to sound young without faking anything; and the album proves that aging doesn't mean getting old for one of the most original, important, and talented bands of the past twenty years.

Sonic Youth released their 19th album 'Sonic Nurse' after a three year long hiatus from the recording studio. The album boasts a more tame sound with same political messages as their past albums.

American Music Awards anounces nominees

Usher and Toby Keith amongst top honors

By Anthony Breznican
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — R&B Casanova Usher, whose album "Confessions" steamed up the charts with songs about sex, affairs and breakups, received a leading four nominations Tuesday for the American Music Awards.

Many categories included last year's winners — Toby Keith, Tim McGraw and Linkin Park — and previous nominees Beyonce, Avril Lavigne, Norah Jones and R. Kelly.

Rapper-producer Kanye West, whose album "The College Dropout" combines gospel, rap and braggadocio, had three nominations, the second most after Usher.

Usher was nominated as favorite male artist in both the pop/rock and soul/R&B categories, and his "Confessions" also has best album bids in both groups.

In the hip-hop/rap class, West was up for favorite male artist, "The College Dropout" got a mention for best album, and his third bid came for the cross-genre award as best newcomer.

Two categories feature all of the same nominees as last year. The country male artist group again includes Kenny Chesney, Alan Jackson, Toby Keith, Tim McGraw (who won in 2003). It also was deja vu for contemporary inspirational music, as 2003 winner Steven Curtis Chapman competes once more against MercyMe and Third Day.

OutKast was nominated for best rap/hip-hop group, and its Grammy winning "Speakerboxxx/The Love Below" got a bid for best rap album.

The awards will be presented during a Nov. 14 ceremony that will be shown live on ABC. Talk show host Jimmy Kimmel will host it.

The nominations are based on sales figures and radio play. Winners are selected by a survey of about 20,000 listeners.

R&B crooner Usher continues to rack up nominations with his fourth album release 'Confessions' on Arista Records.

The swimsuit dilemma:

Potential 'Miss Universe' restricted by religion

Artika Sari Devi, Miss Indonesia, may find herself at the end of the road for the title of Miss Universe.

By Michael Casey
ASSOCIATED PRESS

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Artika Sari Devi looks the part of a beauty queen with her million-dollar smile and hourglass figure; And she dreams of becoming Indonesia's first Miss Universe.

There is only one thing holding her back — a swimsuit.

Like most international beauty competitions, Miss Universe requires participants to appear in a swimsuit — either a one-piece model or a bikini. But here in the world's most populous Muslim nation, the 24-year-old Miss Indonesia faces condemnation from religious leaders and government officials who say women in swimsuits violate religious tenets requiring them to dress modestly.

"Every country can join the competition, so why not Indonesia?" asks Artika, who won the Miss Indonesia pageant in August, an event that does not require contestants to parade in swimwear. "I don't see a problem with the swimsuit. It's only to show my proportions. ... So many Muslims wear swimsuits. I wear one swimming," she says.

Battles over bathing suits would seem out of place in Indonesia, where newsstands are filled with magazines featuring scantily clad models and miniskirts. Prostitution rings operate openly in all major cities.

But Islamic conservatives — some of whom want to replace Indonesia's secular system with one bound by Islamic law — have been emboldened since the fall of ex-dictator Suharto in 1998. Under pressure from fundamentalists, the male-dominated parliament is debating a law that would make kissing in public and erotic dancing punishable by jail time.

Legislation that would stiffen penalties for domestic violence and allow abortion in certain cases have bogged down amid opposition from conservatives.

Film censors recently banned "Kiss Me Quick," a teenage romantic comedy after protests by a popular Muslim cleric who said the title could encourage promiscuity.

Beauty contests, too, have long been a target of Islamic conservatives in Indonesia and other parts of the world.

In 2002, the Miss World pageant was moved out of Nigeria after it sparked riots by Muslims that killed 200 people, and in 1998 the Miss Bangladesh contest was canceled after days of violent protests by Islamic groups.

During his 32-year reign, Suharto banned women from participating in beauty contests because he felt they were not compatible with "Indonesia's culture."

Alaya Rohali, now a popular television presenter, defied the ban in 1996 and competed in a Miss Universe contest in Las Vegas — only to return home to threats and media attacks.

"Beauty contests manipulate the rights of women for the sake of commercial interests and that is not good for Islam," says Irfan Awwas, a spokesman for the Islamic group Majelis Mujahidin, which has vowed to launch protests if Indonesia sends anyone to Miss Universe.

Miss Indonesia organizers, led by 76-year-old cosmetics executive Mooryati Soedibyo, are seeking to win over a skeptical public, hoping to enable Artika to take part in next summer's Miss Universe pageant in Thailand.

They brought Miss Egypt to Indonesia in July to demonstrate that other Muslim countries take part, including neighboring Malaysia. They also arranged a meeting between Miss Universe 2004, Jennifer Hawkins of Australia, and President Megawati Sukarnoputri.

Officials from Miss Universe, too, have tried to find a compromise — proposing last year that an Indonesian participant wear a one-piece swimsuit like a few other contestants do. But Indonesian organizers told them the country "was not ready."

"Every year, we give the women a choice of what swimsuit they want to wear," says Mary Hilliard McMillan, a spokeswoman for Miss Universe in New York.

"But they have to wear a swimsuit. Our contest has 54 years of history and in those 54 years the competition and rules have been the same. At the end of the day, it's a beauty contest and being judged on physical fitness is one-third of what determines that."

Indonesia's government has so far refrained from taking a side in the controversy, possibly mindful of the protests that engulfed the Suharto administration. "I support the competition as long as it's in accordance with our culture," says Sri Redjeki Soemaryoto, the women's empowerment minister. "But I only support it if she does not wear a bikini."

Mooryati, a soft-spoken Javanese princess, admits her nearly 20-year campaign to send an Indonesian to the Miss Universe contest has stirred its share of controversy.

She considers opposition to the contest as shortsighted, arguing that participation by Miss Indonesia could help Indonesia's battered tourist economy. It has struggled since Islamic militants bombed two nightclubs on the resort island of Bali in 2002, killing 202 people.

"The purpose of this competition is good ... to exchange culture, to promote your tourist industry, your country's products and arts," Mooryati says. "By doing this, we are accepting that we have entered the globalization era."

Shea looks for first win

MATTHEW REBOCCHI/COLLEGIAN

be in the cage tonight for UMass. Tocco currently ranks third in the Atlantic 10 with a 9.60 save per game average.

Shea feels there is something special about this game. "One thing that is unique in the New England area is the rivalry between our schools," Shea said. "They love representing their school, and they never stop fighting and digging. BU likes to control the tempo of the game, and we can't let them do that in this game."

If UMass is going to win this game, they are going to have to play more cohesively than they have been.

"The biggest thing we need to do is turn the ball over less," Shea said. "We also need better decision making, and we must attack the goal." BU is coming off consecutive losses at California and at home against Boston College. UMass meanwhile was shut out in losses against Maryland (6-0) and American (4-2) at the Terrapin Invitational this past weekend.

"I'm excited for this game," Shea said. "The team is excited for it. We're looking forward to showing off Garber Field, using it to our advantage, and taking all prisoners. You never let another team come in and dominate your field. This is our field."

Ryder team trusts Woods

Nicklaus (for those keeping score, his record was 17-8-3) played in a different era of the Ryder Cup, a time when the Americans only had to show up to claim the gold trophy.

The United States was 5-0-1 in Nicklaus' six Ryder Cups, only one of which came after commental players were added to the European team to make it more competitive. The first one was the famous tie, when he graciously conceded Tony Jacklin a short par putt on the final hole of the final match. In the other five matches, the Americans won by at least five points, a margin that now would be considered a blowout.

Europe has captured the cup six of the last nine times, so it's no surprise that Phil Mickelson (8-5-3) and David Toms (3-1-1) are the only U.S. players with a winning record.

"Guys, I go out there with the same attitude, and that's just to win, period," Woods said. "I don't go into any tournament thinking it would be great to lose. It would be asinine to think that way."

Sutton doesn't believe he has anything to worry about.

He looked like a college football coach during the Tuesday practice round — the square jaw, the sunglasses, arms folded across his paunch — as he watched Woods hit a wedge that spun back over the cup on the 11th green.

Someone mentioned that Woods was in a slump, having won only one time this year and losing the No. 1 ranking for the first time in five years.

"Oh, man, I was out there watching him play. I don't know if you've been out there, but I've been licking my chops over it," Sutton said. "I don't think he's in any sort of a slump right now. I aspire to be in his slumps.

"No, no, don't be worried about Tiger Woods. If that's your only worry, you have no worries."

Europe wasn't buying into it, either.

Padraig Harrington of Ireland, his team's highest-ranked player, said he thought Woods might be tougher this week at Oakland Hills than at his other two Ryder Cups.

"His record has not been as good as he would like," Harrington said. "He's out to prove something. There's definitely going to be a backlash from Tiger at some Ryder Cup. It's going to happen. I would think it's more of a wounded Tiger at the moment, and it would be very dangerous to play against him. "He's going to have something to prove, and I would see him as quite intimidating."

Bartman not forgotten

By Mike Berardino
Knight Ridder Newspapers

CHICAGO — Blair Flavel walked through the portal, gazed out at the green expanse of Wrigley Field on a gorgeous Saturday afternoon and showed his ticket to an usher.

"Oh, my God," the elderly man told Flavel, recoiling at the sight of his stub for this Marlins-Cubs game. "You're in the Bartman seat."

It usually sits empty, the locals say. An unlikely monument of hard, green plastic at the end of Row 8, Aisle 4 down the left-field line.

"Most Chicagoans won't sit there," said Debra Miller of Homewood, Ill., sitting two seats over.

Seat 113 costs the same $36 as all the others in the section. It is covered with 12 small, circular Cubs decals, but otherwise you'd never guess this is the spot where Steve Bartman stood last Oct. 14 and helped change the course of baseball history.

By now every Marlins and Cubs fan has the sequence burned into their memories: Game 6 of the National League Championship Series. Eighth inning. Cubs up, 3-0. Five outs from their first pennant in 58 years.

With Juan Pierre on second, Luis Castillo lofts a foul pop that drifts into the first row of curved seats. Chicago's Moises Alou leaps and thrusts his outstretched glove into a thicket of fans, only to have Bartman knock it away.

Alou threw a fit. Cubs pitcher Mark Prior walked Castillo. In the visiting dugout, the Marlins were walking around saying, "Hey, let's make that guy (Bartman) famous." Eight runs later, the inning finally ended, and so, effectively, did Bartman's life as he knew it.

He is 27 now and still lives in the city's western suburbs. A rumored petition for a job transfer to London apparently never came through.

Bartman quickly went underground after security workers had to escort him out of the field-level boxes and away from an angry mob. He issued a statement of remorse in the days after the Cubs blew the NLCS, but otherwise hasn't been heard from publicly in the last 11 months. And he hasn't been back to Wrigley to watch his beloved Cubs.

"I'm sure, being a Cubs fan, he's had a lot of sleepless nights since then," said Flavel, operations manager for a farm machinery company.

Flavel, 40, was watching Game 6 on TV back in Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada, with his cousin. They could immediately sense the momentum shift after the Bartman play.

Of course, Flavel also correctly noted Bartman's sin might have been forgiven had former Cubs shortstop Alex Gonzalez not booted Miguel Cabrera's double-play grounder two batters later.

"Steve only did what any fan would do in the heat of the moment," Flavel said. "Right now, I'm not sure I wouldn't put my arm over the wall if a ball came this way. He was just in the wrong place at the wrong time. If he could take it back, he certainly would."

One row back, Brad Rendell just shook his head.

"They blew up the ball," said Rendell, who lives in nearby Winnetka, Ill. "I think they should rip the seat out and blow it up too. They'd get a huge crowd."

Flavel, sporting jeans, a Cubs cap and a Cubs jersey — just like Bartman last October — turned around to make sure the seat wouldn't be blown up with him still in it.

Rendell was sitting with his 14-year-old daughter, Brittany, and 9-year-old son, Austin, who kept leaning over the railing with his glove. Rendell, like many other Cub fans, falls somewhere between bemusement, anger and sympathy when it comes to Bartman.

Rendell's health club has a large, doctored photo of Bartman on its walls. A Billy goat is superimposed in a nod to the other great curse in Cubs history.

"It's funny, but it's unfortunate too," Rendell said. "Actually, I do feel bad for the guy because he gets singled out."

What would these fans say to Bartman if they had the chance? Earlier, in the Cubs clubhouse, Prior said he might ask Bartman how he was doing and tell him, "Don't worry about it."

Flavel's reply: "I'd tell him, Hey, buddy, it's not your fault.'"

At this Debra Miller's husband, David, piped up.

"You know (what) I'd say?" Miller said. " Hey, sorry. You got caught up in the moment, but you are still the goat.' End of story."

UMass gets its first win

can't make those mistakes, but overall we played much better than we have."

The Minutemen struck early against the Hawks, as junior captain Orail Bullen netted a cross from Charest on the right side of the box, ten yards out. The goal was Bullen's first on the year, and the first goal scored by someone other than a freshman.

As the second half got underway, the Maroon and White scored again, this time it was Bullen sharing with Charest. Bullen crossed a pass in front of the goal and Charest darted and headed in the game's second goal.

A large part of the UMass offense stemmed from the aggressive play of Tyler Pagano. Pagano only had two shots on the game, but was opening up opportunities on the right wing for most of the second half. He and freshman Matty Lemire had several well-placed crosses that nearly resulted in goals.

"I think he (Pagano) was one of many players that played well in the attack, but he's one player out of many and it has to be a full effort from everyone," Koch said.

The Minutemen began to sit back a bit as the period went on, seemingly looking to preserve their lead. Hartford, however, would not go quietly into the night.

Alon Lubesky, the Hawks leading goal scorer (6), received a pass at the inside top left of the box from Kemmiel Martin. Lubesky rocketed the ball past Billman at 60:18 and the pressure was on for the rest of the game.

UMass attacked a few more times, but Carr was nearly unstoppable. Carr ended the game with 10 total saves, including one off of a one-on-one with Bullen in the waning minutes of regulation.

The Hawks scored their second goal with another well-placed pass from Martin. Harry Vasiliadis, who had been subbed into the game earlier in the half, received Martin's pass five meters away from the net and chipped in the equalizer.

Overtime was hard fought by both teams, as neither was able to get off more than one shot in the first 10-minute stanza. However, the one shot on goal for the Hawks was literally inches away from ending the game.

With sophomore keeper Nick Billman out of position Hartford volleyed the ball back into the box and took a shot right on target. Tim Kitchell sprinted in, slid and made the defensive save, all with less than a minute left in the period.

The Minutemen had two shots in the next period as they controlled the ball in the Hawks zone. UMass had three corner kicks in the period, including Higa's which set up the game winner.

"A lot of the guys just got there first win here, we need to be winning at home, and this is our field and we need to take it to our advantage," junior captain Craig Caruvan said.

Freshman midfielder Matty Lemire sprints past a Hartford defender in yesterday's game. UMass will compete in the UMass Classic this weekend.

Woods must lead Ryder Cup team

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

BLOOMFIELD TOWNSHIP, Mich. — Tiger Woods has been chasing Jack Nicklaus in golf record books since he was a kid. When it comes to the Ryder Cup, though, Tiger doesn't mean Jack. Woods has won more PGA Tour events than Nicklaus at this stage in his career, and his eight majors put him on pace to break Nicklaus' all-time record.

Now, U.S. captain Hal Sutton wants him to bring that same purpose to the Ryder Cup.

"Nobody has to give Tiger Woods a pep talk," Sutton said Tuesday after the first day of practice at Oakland Hills.

"All we have to do is just say, 'Hey, Tiger, it's time you felt this is important. I want you to realize that this is going to be an area that guys are going to judge you by down the road, whether you like it or dislike it. You're the one who chose to be as great as you are. Let's give it all you've got and lead this team.'"

Woods can only contribute five points to the 14 1/2 points the United States needs to win back the Ryder Cup, but his record has hardly been an inspiration.

He is 5-8-2 in his three Ryder Cup matches.

He has been shut out on the first day the last two times, allowing Europe to seize early control.

He comes into this one no longer No. 1 in the world, his five-year reign atop the world ranking uprooted by Vijay Singh two weeks ago outside Boston. Even so, he is the star of the American team, and in that regard, his captain's urging is new to Woods.

"It's not any different than the rest of the captains have said," Woods said. "I qualified No. 1 in points every time. All I know is that I've tried my best. Unfortunately, I just haven't gotten more points for our team. Hopefully, I'll be able to get more points for our team where we can win this thing."

Players take one week every other year to compete with their European counterparts for pride and patriotism. The rest of the time, they are trying to win major championships, and Woods drove home that point with a quiz for reporters.

"I'm sure all of you guys probably know what Jack's record is in the Ryder Cup, right?" he said, looking around a crowded room and getting no takers. "Anybody? No?

"How many majors did he win?" Woods continued, and heard murmurs of "18" across the room.

Then again, Woods got himself in trouble with the British press two years ago at the American Express Championship in Ireland, a week before the Ryder Cup. He was asked which week was more important for him to win, and he picked the World Golf Championship.

"Why? I can think of a million reasons," Woods said, referring to the $1 million winner's check. But comparisons to Nicklaus

Classic coaches enshrined in bronze

By Randall Mell

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — There's no getting rid of Bobby Bowden and Joe Paterno now.

Poised to resume chasing each other deeper into uncharted territory in the college football record books, the game's elder statesmen begin this new season with a rare type of security, even ungrateful alumni can't crack.

Deep into their 70s now, well into their sixth decades roaming sidelines, they're enjoying the immortal feeling only bronze can bestow.

In a little more than two weeks, on the eve of the Clemson game, Florida State officials will unveil a 9-foot bronze statue of Bowden adjacent to the north end zone at Doak Campbell Stadium.

"From what I've heard, they ran out of money and bronze and they're going to make him thin," cracked Clemson coach Tommy Bowden, Bobby's son. "It's not realistic, so I'm going to get some red clay and lix that belly."

Bowden is truly larger than life now, while Paterno has been for some time.

Outside the east end zone at Penn State's Beaver Stadium, a 7-foot bronze image of Paterno that weighs nearly half a ton was erected four seasons ago.

Not many coaches end up in bronze, even fewer while they're still alive, almost none while they're still coaching.

No other college football coaches today — apologies to Lou Holtz — rank in the living-legend class with Bowden and Paterno. They're the lone survivors of a bygone era, giants whose personas loom as large as their records, men who entered the profession when Bud Wilkinson, Bear Bryant and Woody Hayes were still prowling sidelines.

While Bowden and Paterno are destined to be remembered with Knute Rockne, Amos Alonzo Stagg and Pop Warner as among the college game's greatest coaches, that doesn't mean they're as beloved as they once were. That's the nature of today's fans. With more losses than they're accustomed the last few seasons, these coaches face inevitable questions about how long they plan to continue to coach. Or, worse yet, how long they should be permitted to continue if they can't keep building on their remarkable records.

There are insiders who believe they'll never retire.

"One of those two will die on the field, I'm sure," Tommy Bowden said.

Bobby Bowden is the winningest football coach in Division I-A, with 342 victories. He overtook Paterno, beating Wake Forest on Oct. 25. Paterno claimed his 340th a season-opening victory against Akron, but his team fell last weekend to Boston College. They both surpassed the legendary Bryant and his 323-victory mark with much fanfare.

How long have these two been around? Holtz, 67, is the closest active Division I coach in wins, and he trails Bowden by 99. Bowden has more than double the victories of the next nearest coach (Frank Beamer, 167).

"Every time I look at that (statue), I keep thinking, Lord, does this mean I'm through?" Bowden said.

Bowden, who will turn 75 on Nov. 8, has watched his program slip a notch, leaving boosters to wonder if last year's correction to 10-3 was a sign Bowden is gearing for another championship run or if it's the best they can expect now. Bowden's teams have lost more games the three past seasons (12) than they did the previous six.

After that unprecedented run of 14 consecutive years with a final top five Associated Press ranking (including two national titles), the Noles haven't cracked the top 10 in the final AP poll in three seasons. It'll be tough to reach those heights after their 10-10 overtime loss to Miami on Sept. 10.

It's worse for Paterno, who will turn 78 at season's end.

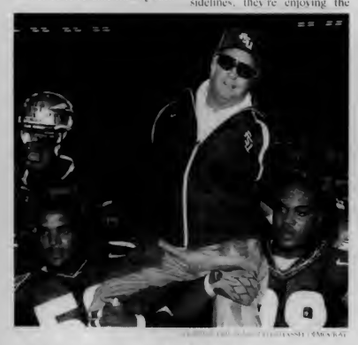
Paterno's Nittany Lions are looking to rebound from a stumble to 3-9, Paterno's worst record in 38 years as coach in Happy Valley. It was his third losing season in the past four. Penn State won just a single Big Ten game a year ago.

The winner of two national titles, orchestrator of five perfect seasons, Paterno witnessed the unthinkable last year. A web site titled JoePaMustGo.com made its debut, and it's still up and running.

"I may be back coaching high school football next year," Paterno cracked last week.

With grumbling growing early this year, Paterno silenced speculation he would walk away by signing a four-year contract extension that runs through 2008. He would be 82 when the deal expired.

Bowden is believed to be signed through at least 2008. The nature of his rollover contract is a bit of a mystery.



"I don't even know what Dad's contract is," Tommy said. "I think it's whatever he wanted."

Though the adulation may not be as fervent as it was in their prime, these coaches still enjoy what they're doing.

During preparation for the season opener, Paterno must have frightened his coaching staff when he lined up with the kickoff coverage team, then sprinted down the field into oncoming blockers.

"I wanted to show the guys that I'm still faster than they are," Paterno said. "One guy said, 'Don't get in my way, I've been waiting for a shot at Paterno.'"

Concerned that his team has been too uptight living up to expectations, the coach is making a concerted effort to focus on the fun that led him into the game.

Minutemen land Hawks

Rob Charest nets winner in OT

By Bob McGovern

Sophomore Rob Charest saw it coming and sent Hartford packing.

In the second overtime in its game against the Hawks, Charest played a ball that was deflected by the post and scored the game-winning goal for the Massachusetts men's soccer team. The Minutemen took the game 3-2.

Hartford	2

The opportunity arose after Richard Higa sent a corner kick towards the net, which bobbled around until it slammed off the right post of the goal. Charest braced himself, lired, and sent the slow game-winner past the outstretched arms of Hartford keeper Ryan Carr.

"I was scared at first, that kid made a big save on Tim (Kitchell)," Charest said. "I mean I saw it hit off the post and I said, 'oh no not again,' then I went in and kicked it over the line; it was pretty exciting."

The win was the first of the year for UMass (1-5), who has had its troubles on the offensive side of the ball this season. The three goals scored was more than the Minutemen had tallied in their first three games combined (2).

UMass coach Sam Koch is pleased that his team pulled out its first victory and can now work on progressing as a team.

"It's real big, we needed it and they deserved it, they earned it and I'm very happy for them," Koch said. "The thing we wanted to do was play well and I think that we did. I think we made a couple mistakes and we

Field Hockey faces Terriers

By Joshua Pollock
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts field hockey team (0-5) will be looking for its first win of the season tonight against the Boston University Terriers (1-3) at 7 p.m. at Garber Field.

Last season the Terriers defeated the Minutewomen 6-1 in Cambridge. UMass leads the all-time series 14-10-2. This will be the first of a 10 game home stand for the Minutewomen, who are the only team in the A-10 conference without a victory. This home stand will last through October 13.

"Playing on your home field is always an advantage," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "It's the field we practice on every day, so we feel very comfortable here. This home stand is really important because it relieves stress from our players. They don't have to go through the grind of traveling, and they don't miss any class time."

For this victory, the Maroon and White will have to go through sophomore goalkeeper Erin Prediger, who is averaging an America East Conference leading 9.75 saves per game.

"She makes good initial saves, and takes good care of the ball so there's no rebound," Shea said, who considers Prediger an excellent goalkeeper. Prediger is also ranked third in her conference in goals against average (1.61). Surprisingly, the Terriers are 1-3 despite Prediger's excellent defense.

Boston University is a very young team after seeing 11 of its letter winners leave the team, and 11 freshmen join. Terriers Head Coach Sally Starr, who is in her 24th season as head coach, is in the process of rebuilding the team. "Coach Starr has done a lot for field hockey," Shea said, "She started the program at BU and really put it on the map."

Celtics train in Vt.

BOSTON — The Boston Celtics will hold their training camp this year at the University of Vermont, the team announced Tuesday.

The Celtics head north to Burlington, Vt., for their first camp under new coach Glenn "Doc" Rivers, who was hired in April to replace interim coach John Carroll. Celtics head of basketball operations Danny Ainge hired Rivers to be the 16th coach in team history soon after Boston was swept from the first round of the NBA playoffs by the Indiana Pacers.

"I believe getting away will afford us the opportunity to get to know each other and allow us to become closer as a team," Rivers said.

Since 1999, the Celtics have trained at their 23,000-square foot practice facility located in an industrial park off Route 128 in Waltham.

This year's camp, from Oct. 5 to Oct. 10, will be at UVM's Patrick Gymnasium, which seats 3,228 and is home to the school's men's and women's basketball teams.

"It is great to have them associated with one of the most storied franchises in the history of the NBA," Vermont athletic director Jeff Shulman said.

The team will hold an intra-squad scrimmage at Patrick Gymnasium on Oct. 9 before heading to Manchester, N.H., for their Oct. 12 preseason opener against the Chicago Bulls.

Skinner get extension

BOSTON — Basketball coach Al Skinner signed a contract extension that will keep him at Boston College through the 2009-2010 season, the school announced Tuesday.

In seven seasons at BC, Skinner has compiled a 122-95 record, taking the Eagles to the NCAA Tournament in 2001, 2002 and 2004.

His best season was in 2000-2001, when BC won a school-record 27 games, winning the Big East's East Division regular season crown and the Big East Tournament championship.

"We're all very excited that Al Skinner will continue to lead our basketball program," athletic director Gene DeFilippo said. "Al is a first-class individual who has done an outstanding job with our basketball team and he's done it in a manner in which we can all be very proud."

Earlier this year, Skinner had his number retired at the University of Massachusetts, where he was one of the program's all-time greats.

A three-time All-Yankee Conference selection in the early 70s, he led UMass to back-to-back NIT appearances. Skinner scored 1,235 career points and led the Minutemen in rebounding from 1971-1974. He was inducted into the UMass Athletic Hall of Fame in 1982.

Ranger's pitcher arrested

By Janie McCauley
Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — The Oakland Athletics and Texas Rangers disagreed over who's to blame for an altercation in the stands that led to the arrest of Rangers reliever Frank Francisco after he threw a chair that hit a woman and broke her nose.

Dave Rinetti, A's vice president of stadium operations, said Tuesday a review of the ninth-inning fracas the night before — which took place in the lower-box seats between the Texas dugout and bullpen — showed the fans' behavior wasn't over the line according to baseball's rules of conduct that are posted at every ballpark entrance.

"The incident became ugly when players approached the seating area," Rinetti said before the teams played the second game of the four-game series. He noted the fans didn't yell racial slurs or swear at the Texas players.

Yet Rangers manager Buck Showalter was quick to point to previous problems the Rangers have had in the Oakland Coliseum. He claimed the Rangers had asked for more security in the area, but Rinetti said neither he nor his security staff had been approached with such a request.

Still, the A's beefed up security for Tuesday's game and the remainder of the series — and probably for the rest of the season. Several additional officers from the Oakland Police Department were brought in to assist the Coliseum's regular security staff, which was increased by 10 people in the visiting bullpen and dugout.

The Rangers had a lengthy team meeting before the game and their clubhouse was not opened to the media the usual 3 1/2 hours before game time.

Francisco was arrested Tuesday morning on a charge of aggravated battery after he threw a chair into the right-field box seats and hit two spectators in the head during the 7-6, 10-inning loss.

The injured woman, identified by her lawyer Tuesday as Jennifer Bueno, 41, of Livermore, wants Francisco to be prosecuted. A civil suit is also a likely possibility, since she'll need medical treatment, said the lawyer, Gary Gwilliam.

Bueno's husband, Craig Bueno, is a battalion chief with the Hayward Fire Department. Gwilliam wouldn't comment on what Bueno might have yelled at the Rangers' players before the fracas, saying he would let the man speak for himself at a news conference on Wednesday.

"There is no justification for what they did," Gwilliam said. "Fans are fans and they have a right to have some fun and do some badgering if they want." Gwilliam said it wasn't just Francisco who went after the A's fans.

"It's the whole damn team that tried to charge and fight with the fans," he said.

Francisco was taken from the stadium to jail, where he was booked and his mug shot was taken. He was released about two hours later on $15,000 bail, Oakland Police spokeswoman Danielle Ashford said.

Major League Baseball's commissioner Bud Selig said he was "very concerned about the incident."

Sandy Alderson, executive vice president of baseball operations, and Kevin Hallinan, senior vice president of security, were en route to Oakland on Tuesday afternoon.

With two outs in the ninth inning, Texas' Alfonso Soriano tied the game 5-5 with his second homer of the night. Moments later, with Hank Blalock batting, the Texas bench and bullpen cleared.

Francisco threw a plastic chair used by a ball boy at a fan in a lower box near the Rangers' bullpen along the right-field line. The chair hit one man in the head, then bounced and struck the woman on her left temple.

Bob Watson, the vice president of on-field operations for baseball, will decide what punishment will be handed out to the players, while Selig said he would monitor the process.

"There is no excuse whatsoever for any attack of our fans by any of our players under any circumstances," Selig said in a statement.

The A's were trying to contact the woman to apologize.

After the game, Showalter said the fans "went over the line."

"It was a real break from the normal trash you hear from fans. We've had problems about every time we've come here," he said.

But on Tuesday, Texas owner Tom Hicks apologized "for the conduct of some members of our club last night in Oakland."

"Their behavior, especially the injury to a fan, was unacceptable. Even in a difficult or abusive environment, players should never be provoked into such actions," Hicks said in a statement, adding that he had been in contact with the commissioner's office. He did not say whether Francisco or any other player would be punished.

Texas reliever Doug Brocail was seen screaming at a male fan, and the pitcher had to be restrained by his teammates and bullpen coach Mark Connor. Others also had to be held back.

A day of reckoning for NHL

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

TORONTO — Wade Redden took off his practice gear unsure of when he'd have a chance to put it on again.

His injured shoulder wouldn't allow him to play for Canada in the World Cup of Hockey championship on Tuesday night. The lack of a collective bargaining agreement between NHL players and owners figures to keep the Ottawa defenseman off the ice much longer.

The current deal expires at 12:01 a.m. Thursday, and with no talks scheduled between the league and the players association, a lockout is a virtual certainty once the NHL board of governors conclude an afternoon meeting in New York.

Training camps won't open this week and games — slated to begin Oct. 13 — will soon be canceled, too.

"Tomorrow is D-Day and it's going to be probably the last time we get on the ice for a bit," Redden said Tuesday.

A bit would be an optimistic view. The sides haven't spoken since talks broke off last Thursday when the players association made a proposal of a luxury-tax system with revenue sharing, a rollback of salaries, and changes to entry-level contracts.

The owners said that framework doesn't ensure cost certainty for its clubs, and NHL commissioner Gary Bettman said the sides "weren't speaking the same language."

"It's a sad situation but there's nothing you can do right now," free-agent forward Teemu Selanne said. "Everybody is expecting a long lockout which is not good for hockey, but it's going to happen no matter what."

That's what happened in the 1994-95 season when the game was shut down for 103 days and the schedule was cut nearly in half. If no deal is reached by January, like it was the last time, the season would likely be lost.

The message in the locker rooms of Canada and Finland was clear. Players won't accept a salary-cap system and they are prepared to wait as long as necessary to get a deal they can live with.

Even if that means sacrificing a season or two.

"I'd rather not miss a year in hockey when I'm 25," Dallas forward Brenden Morrow said. "I'd like to be playing, but I'm just one small piece of this whole puzzle.

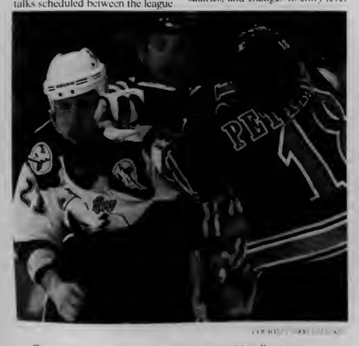
"So until we can divide up that pie and everyone be happy with their piece, we're not going to get too much hockey played this year."

Both the Canadians and Finns said they were keeping their focus on the final game of the World Cup and would worry about the future once the final buzzer sounded Tuesday night.

But they couldn't escape the countless questions about what was coming. And judging by the answers, the tenuous situation was very much on their minds.

"We're going to enjoy this moment as much as we can because you never know when you're going to play next," Selanne said.

While that was true for Selanne, who is mulling various options for what to do during the lockout and others for when the NHL starts up again, some of his teammates do have upcoming games.



Ville Nieminen, a forward with the Calgary Flames, will join his hometown team in the Finnish Elite League that begins this week. European players have more options in that regard than their North American counterparts, who could join some optimistic startup leagues.

"If I don't do anything I can't play hockey ever again. I like food too much," Nieminen said. Morrow has opportunities to play in Europe but he has been reluctant to act on them since he has an infant baby at home and is not eager to go so far away.

"I want to take a few weeks after this tournament, go back to Dallas and wait for a miracle to happen," he said. "If it doesn't, then I'll check over my options.

"I don't think I'm going to go a year without hockey. I'm going to end up doing something eventually. I'm just not doing anything tomorrow."

On Monday, Nieminen took some of his younger Finnish teammates to the players association offices and introduced them to representatives.

Say goodbye to "AB" and "BC"

UMass incorporates new grading system

By Jeremy Dirac
Collegian Correspondent

After this fall, University of Massachusetts students who are sophomores or older will see two different grading systems used on their transcripts.

UMass students will now be awarded grades in an 11-point grading system rather than the old eight-point system. For instance, an A will equal a 4.0 and an A-minus will equal a score of 3.7. With the old system, an A-minus was equivalent to an "AB". A B-plus was also equal to an "AB".

According to Registrar Elizabeth Pyle, when UMass first began using the old system in 1972, the University was following a national trend in the U.S. educational system by expanding the grading system beyond whole letter grades, such as As, Bs, and Cs.

At the 142nd meeting of the Faculty Senate on May 1 and 8, 1969, the senate passed the eight-point undergraduate grading system. Meanwhile, the Student Senate approved the more radical 12-point system — closer to the system recently adopted. In the end, the 8-point system won out.

In a Collegian interview with Professor Mokhtar Atallah, a member of the Academic Matters Council, Atallah said the new system could possibly create greater difficulties for professors when deciding a student's grade, especially in larger classes where professors and students have less contact with one another. This is something that may have held back the students' plan in 1972.

Atallah originally presented the new grading system to the Student Government Association with Senators Brian Long and Kiera Marikoff.

According to Atallah, the first person to start discussing a change to the grading system was a student representative of the SGA, Christophe Courchesne, in spring 2001.

Courchesne, who graduated from law school in June, said that he wishes the grading system change had been his idea, but it wasn't. Courchesne says that Professor Laura Doyle of the English Department, and Registrar Pyle spearheaded the move to change the grading system.

According to Courchesne, he brought the case for a new grading system before the Academic Matters Council. Pyle recalls Courchesne bringing the suggestion forward to her, and recalls hearing it coming from other directions as well.

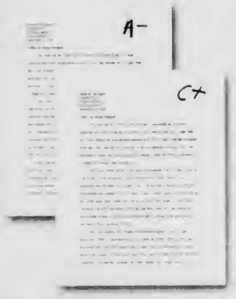
"I think that it should have been something that was done a long time ago, and it's great that students are going to get more feedback on their work," Courchesne said.

Long said that delays may have had to do with no one taking the initiative.

"It's something that's been talked about a long time but never had been gotten a hold of by the faculty," he said. "People were always chitchatting about it, it took someone to take a hold of it and start running."

Chair of the Academic Matters council, John Jenkins explained that after a proposal like the grading system change is passed, the changes are usually implemented the following year. The proposal to change the grading system was approved by the Faculty Senate on April 10, 2003 and implemented at the start of this semester.

Jenkins says that sometimes it's a problem to get students to come to Academic Matters council meetings like the one that Courchesne sat in on where he pushed for a new grading system.



"We have two more openings for students [this semester] and I would be very pleased if we could get two more," he said.

The special report, presented to the Faculty Senate on April 10, said the old grading system is used by fewer than 10 of the 125 Research I and Research II universities, or universities that were deemed comparable to UMass by officials running the survey.

"I would get an occasional call from people saying 'I have this grade on your transcript, I don't have any others like it from anywhere else, I'm having to reinterpret it in my own way,'" Pyle said. "Sometimes those own ways were not very favorable to our students." When a graduate school got grades such as ABs from UMass, they could reinterpret the grades very conservatively — such as treating an AB as a B.

The A-A-minus system (the specific grade points assigned to each letter grade can vary slightly from school to school) puts UMass in conformity with most universities and high schools, including the other four members of the Five

Students can register to vote on campus this weekend

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Students from the Five College area are encouraged to come to the Haigis Mall on the University of Massachusetts Saturday to register to vote, apply for an absentee ballot or enjoy the festivities all in part of "01003 Votes," a major campaign by the Student Activities Center to encourage 18 to 24-year-olds to vote.

Melissa Vara, coordinator for "01003 Votes!" is hoping for a large turnout on Saturday. She wants to spread the message to students that the upcoming presidential election is important, perhaps more important than ever.

"It is important because it is our civic duty, voting among 18-24 year olds has been declining," Vara said, "we want to make this as easy as possible for students."

Vara has covered every angle to ensure maximum voter turnout. Students who feel that they don't know enough about the candidates will find representatives from the area to answer any questions.

Representatives from non-partisan groups, the Democratic Party and the Republican Party will also be present to inform. Additionally, festivities include live music from Boston's fam'n 94.5 (WJMN), refreshments from "Sweets and More" and several local bands to provide live entertainment.

"We want to make it fun and also get the message sent," she said. "There will be prizes, games and t-shirts."

Those who are in a hurry can simply register or apply and then leave. Out of state students can also register to vote or apply for an absentee ballot. Absentee ballots are necessary to vote in this year's presidential election on Nov. 2 if students do not plan to be in their hometowns on that day. Students can fill out an application that only requires a name, hometown and a reason for why they will not be present in their hometowns to vote. The application is then sent to their hometown offices and before Nov. 2, a ballot will be mailed to a student's dormitory, apartment or place of residence.

UMass will also be donating the cost of postage to mail out the registrations and the absentee ballot applications as well as providing transportation and shuttles on the day of the election to the various designated poll locations.

"There will be shuttles from various location on campus, so no one has to worry about getting to the polls," Vara said.

Vara wants to urge students to understand the importance of this year's election and the importance of voting.

"It goes along with the mission of UMass, education, academics and being a good citizen," she said. As for a target number of students to come out on Saturday, Vara hopes for, "everyone."

Students, who cannot attend the campaign, are asked to come to the Student Activities Office in the Student Union and request either a registration application or an absentee ballot application. The absolute deadline to register or request and absentee ballot is October 15, 2004.

In the case of rain, "01003 Votes!" will be held in the Student Union Ballroom from 1-4 p.m.

Two UMass professors receive $40,000 grant

UMass Professor Brian Levine

By Lauren Reingold
Collegian Correspondent

The National Science Foundation (NSF) has awarded two University of Massachusetts professors a grant in the amount of $300,000.

The grant is to be shared with four other professors from the Five College Consortium. UMass assistant professors of computer science Mark Corner and Brian Levine will be using the money to expand the field of computer security, along with their colleagues, Professors Scott Kaplan of Amherst College, Richard Weiss of Hampshire College, Sami Rollins of Mount Holyoke College, and Nicholas Howe of Smith College. Together, the professors will try to improve their respective graduate and undergraduate programs over the course of two years in a field called "information assurance."

Levine and Corner have also been granted an additional $80,000 from the National Security Agency (NSA). This one-year grant is meant to support programs in the Center of Academic Excellence in Information Assurance Education (CAEIAE), as well as the scholarship of Amos Wetherbee, an undergraduate enrolled in Commonwealth College.

This grant works hand-in-hand with the larger grant awarded by the NSF which is also supported by the dean of UMass' College of Natural Science and Mathematics, as well as the Computer Science department.

The whole grant project is meant to make more courses and materials available in this specific field. This includes a series of speakers to take place over the two funded years as well. The speakers will expand knowledge in both the academic and industrial sides of computer science and security, laboratory experience, and accessibility to hands-on situations.

One particularly interesting focus of the plan is its aim to get women more involved in computer security where Corner says they are "grossly underrepresented." This component of the project is perhaps what separated this proposal from all the others submitted for this same grant. The NSF puts out a call for such proposals each time it has a grant. In this case the call was about computer security education. The focus on women was simply the result of Corner and Levine's own creativity.

They both hope to have an impact that extends beyond the two years for which they have been funded by using their time to drum up interest in computer security and related fields that are often underestimated in terms of importance. The broad impact they hope to have is made even more possible by the collaboration with the other schools in the Consortium where they share similar goals concerning computer security.

Computer security encompasses subjects from the protection of large-scale systems like SPIRE, to the protection of individual users from things like worms, viruses, or even themselves. So at the end of two years this important sect of computer science will be more publicized and its importance more realized.

This is not the first time that the UMass Computer Science department has received grants from the NIS. In fact, Corner says that they provide a crucial amount of its funding every year. The NSF which funds science and engineering research to more than 2,000 colleges, universities, and other institutions. The NSF boasts a whopping 20 percent of the nation's federal funding for academic research.

The Computer Science department is also not the only University department to benefit from the generosity of the NSF. Recently, for instance, the Isenberg School of management received a grant through Professor Anna Nagurney to study telecommunications/teleshopping. UMass also received funding to connect to the NIS' computer network, Backbone Network Service.

Clark student found dead

WORCESTER (AP) — Police discovered the body of a missing Clark University student inside his parked car on Wednesday morning, but it was not immediately known how he died.

Joseph S. Veninca, of Westboro, had been missing since last Thursday night, when he went to his parents' home to take a shower and get some supplies before heading back to college.

Family members said Veninca, 20, was an insulin-dependent diabetic who had left his testing supplies behind and was probably running low on insulin.

Veninca's body was found around 9 a.m. inside his Mercury Sable, which was parked on Beaver Brook Parkway in Worcester Police Sgt. Gary Quitadamo said the state medical examiner's office will determine the cause of death.

"No obvious signs of foul play have been discovered," Quitadamo said.

Someone had used Veninca's ATM card Friday morning in a failed attempt to withdraw money. Investigators and the family viewed the ATM surveillance tape and did not recognize Veninca.

His mother, Barbara Veninca, thanked those who helped in the search for her son.

"The community effort and the media and the local businesses and the police service and our friends and family have been overwhelming," she said. "Without all this community support we wouldn't be able to bring him home."

Clark University Dean of Students Denise Darrigand released a statement saying, "Our thoughts and prayers are with the Veninca family during this difficult time."

Russian officials look within own police force for clues to hostage assaliants

By Burt Herman
Associated Press

MOSCOW (AP) — Russian police investigating the deadly Beslan school siege are looking inside their own squad house: One of the attack organizers was allegedly a former cop who disappeared six years ago.

He wouldn't be the first to turn traitor. Turncoats have appeared in the highest ranks of law enforcement in the Caucasus. Police have been implicated in kidnappings for ransom and accused of allowing Chechen rebels free passage through checkpoints — motivated by either money, sympathy for the fighters' cause or family ties, or a combination of all three.

Vyacheslav Izmailov, a former army major who has worked to resolve kidnappings in Chechnya, said one example of a high-ranking turncoat is a former interior minister of Ingushetia, a Russian region neighboring Chechnya. Daud Korigov, minister from 1997-98, gave rebels the use of a house he owned in the Chechen capital Grozny and was even seen there among captives, Izmailov said.

How many turncoats are there among law enforcement?

"It's not a few," Izmailov told The Associated Press.

Russian authorities say one of the plotters behind the attack in Beslan, where more than 330 people died, was Ali Taziyev, a policeman from Ingushetia. Taziyev was allegedly abducted with another officer in October 1998 while guarding the wife of a government official.

The woman was freed in 2000, and the body of Taziyev's partner was found in Chechnya. Later that year, a court in Ingushetia declared Taziyev dead.

Now, Russian officials believe he actually went over to the rebel side, changing his name to Magomed Yevloyev and taking the nom de guerre "Magas" after the new Ingush capital, the Vremya Novostei newspaper reported.

Taziyev, a Muslim, is accused of becoming an adherent of the extreme Wahhabi sect of Islam — the same as al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden — and forming his own small band of fighters. Islam is the predominant religion in the Caucasus North Ossetia, where the school siege took place, is unusual in that its predominant faith is Russian Orthodox.

Taziyev allegedly also spearheaded a June raid in Ingushetia that targeted police and security forces and killed 88 people. There were conflicting statements at the time about whether he died in the attack. Several other police officers were arrested for involvement.

So far, Taziyev's participation hasn't been confirmed in the attack in Beslan, North Ossetia — which shares borders with both Ingushetia and Chechnya — and his body wasn't among the attackers who died there after Russian forces stormed the building Sept. 3.

A top law enforcement officer signaled Wednesday that investigators are taking a hard look at how police and security agencies responded during the school siege. Meanwhile, students in Beslan returned to class Wednesday, two weeks after the heavily armed militants took more than 1,200 children and adults hostage. The children were accompanied by nervous relatives and armed, camouflage-clad police and the town's schools held a moment of silence to remember the victims.

Questions remain about whether Taziyev was a turncoat while still a policeman — or whether he was turned to the rebel cause by his captors after he was purportedly kidnapped.

It's highly unlikely an honest police officer would have been kidnapped and turned to the rebel side without prior militant ties, said Yulia Latynina, a political analyst and columnist.

"I find it very suspicious that a real policeman who was kidnapped by the Chechen rebels was not killed immediately," she said. "If there's such a story, it's more probable to suspect he was in on the kidnapping from the beginning."

Curran to restore 'decency' to office

By Trudy Tynan
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A political newcomer who ousted indicted two-term state Rep. Christopher Asselin in the Democratic primary says he wants to "restore some decency to the office."

Asselin, 35, and eight members of his politically connected family, including his wife, mother, father, sister and brothers, were indicted in July on federal corruption charges for allegedly bilking more than $1 million from the Springfield Housing Authority.

Sean Curran, 26, who graduated from law school two years ago and lives with his parents, swept the three-way race in the 9th Hampden District with 2,047 votes, followed by Springfield City Councilor Rosemarie Mazza Moriarty with 1,209.

Asselin was third with 594 votes, or about 15 percent of those cast.

In November, Curran faces Libertarian Robert Underwood, a write-in candidate, in the district that includes some heavily Irish neighborhoods.

"Time and time again an incumbent, who fought the law, will lose against a fresh face who says its time for a change," said Tobe Berkovitz, a political muscle and a residual of good will," Berkovitz said. "But don't put money on it."

In Asselin's case, the legal problems were too much to overcome.

"I wouldn't vote for someone who's been arrested," said Larry Turcotte, 80, after casting his ballot at Our Lady of Hope Center.

In his first bid for public office, Curran took dead aim at both Asselin's legal troubles and the cash-strapped city's financial woes, maintaining that Mazza Moriarty, as a two-term city councilor, bore some responsibility for the city's problems.

Mazza Moriarty acknowledged the vote may have reflected "frustration, with the city's current situation."

Saudi Arabia violates religious freedom

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — In an unusual censure of a key ally in the war on terrorism, the Bush administration on Wednesday accused Saudi Arabia of "particularly severe violations" of religious freedom.

The State Department also included the kingdom for the first time on a list of countries that could be subject to U.S. sanctions because of religious intolerance.

Nations in this category carry a special designation: "countries of particular concern," or CPCs. "Freedom of religion does not exist," the State Department said, summing up the situation in Saudi Arabia in a report that covered religious freedom in 191 countries.

Those who do not adhere to the officially sanctioned strain of Sunni Islam practiced in the country can face "severe repercussions" from religious police, the report said.

It also cited instances in which government-paid mosque preachers "used violent anti-Jewish and anti-Christian language in their sermons."

For the first time in the six years the State Department has been evaluating the state of religious freedom internationally, Saudi Arabia earned the CPC designation.

Other newcomers to the list were Eritrea and Vietnam. Carried over from last year's list were Myanmar, China, Iran, North Korea and Sudan.

The administration took the action against the Saudis despite indications that they are relaxing their policies toward nonofficial religious groups.

Ambassador John Hanford, who is the State Department's top official for the office of religious freedom, praised statements by Saudi ruler Crown Prince Abdullah in support of tolerance and moderation.

Hanford also told reporters the Saudis have begun a dialogue with the Shiite minority, which historically has suffered from discrimination.

In addition, Hanford said, school textbooks have been revised to take out inflammatory statements against non-establishment religious groups.

While acknowledging these improvements, Hanford said the Saudis have not done enough to escape the CPC designation.

He said the administration has had discussions with the Saudis on religious freedom and plans more.

At the time of Secretary of State Colin Powell's last meeting with the Saudi foreign minister, six weeks ago in Jiddah, he congratulated the kingdom for successes in the war on terrorism and praised its reform efforts.

Hanford also extolled the Saudi role in promoting energy security and Middle East peace.

The CPC designation could mean sanctions for Saudi Arabia, but any such action appears to be unlikely. The Saudi Embassy declined comment on the U.S. action.

The move was welcomed by Preeta D. Bansal, head of the U.S. Commission on International Freedom, an independent group that receives government funding and offers advice to the State Department.

Bansal said the commission's stand was based not only on violations of religious freedom within Saudi Arabia's own borders "but also its propagation and export of an ideology of religious hate and intolerance throughout the world."

Alex Arriaga of Amnesty International USA said, "Sustained pressure will be required to bring about any improvement in Saudi Arabia's egregious record of religious repression."

Jurors examine Peterson photos

By Brain Skoloff
Associated Press

REDWOOD CITY, Calif. — Jurors in Scott Peterson's murder trial winced and glanced away Wednesday as they looked at photos of Laci Peterson's badly decomposed body cast in larger-than-life images on a white wall screen.

Her corpse was missing the head, neck, forearms and part of her left leg, and her rib cage and other bones speckled with barnacles were exposed.

Dr. Brian Peterson, the forensic pathologist who performed the autopsy, said two of Laci's ribs were fractured but he could not say whether the injuries came before or after her death. Brian Peterson isn't related to Laci or Scott Peterson.

"The only internal organ that was present was the uterus," Peterson told jurors. "I was limited by the fact there was so much of the body absent."

Peterson said he examined the remains for any signs that her extremities had been physically cut off, but could find nothing conclusive.

"For example, if a joint were taken apart with a knife or a saw, that would oftentimes leave marks on the bone. There were no such marks," Peterson said.

He said the tides and currents in San Francisco Bay, or fish eating away at her flesh, could have caused the body to tear apart.

He explained in detail how autopsies are performed by cutting open the chest and head and removing the organs.

"In this case, there was no brain to examine because the head was missing. There was no heart or lungs to examine because the chest was empty," he said.

He said he could tell the woman had been pregnant by the size of her uterus, which had expanded to about 10 inches. It normally is the size of a golf ball, he said.

Peterson said the top of the uterus was open and there were no signs of a cesarian section.

"I determined the baby had exited through the top of the uterus," he said.

Prosecutors are trying to prove that Peterson killed his eight-months pregnant wife on or around Dec. 24, 2002, then dumped her weighted body into the bay.

The remains of Laci Peterson and her fetus washed up in April 2003 not far from the Berkeley Marina, where Scott Peterson says he launched his boat that Christmas Eve morning for a solo fishing trip.

Defense lawyers maintain that someone else abducted and killed Laci as she walked the couple's dog around the neighborhood after Peterson had left for his fishing trip. They claim the baby was born alive and killed later.

Prosecutors maintain the fetus was expelled from Laci's decaying corpse.

Earlier, prosecutors used an expert to attempt to show Peterson lied about a crucial element in the case when he told police he used cement mix to repair his driveway.

Prosecutors claim Peterson used the cement to make five anchors, one of which was found in his boat. The others, which they allege he used to sink his wife's body in the bay, have not been discovered.

Peterson told police he made only one anchor and used the rest of a 90-pound bag of cement to repair his driveway. Jurors have also heard Peterson tell the same story to his dead wife's brother, Brent Rocha, on a wiretapped telephone call.

However, a prosecution witness testified the concrete samples taken by police from Peterson's driveway did not match the concrete in the anchor discovered on the boat.

Church set to close despite protesting

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — A Superior Court judge on Wednesday rejected an attempt by parishioners to save St. Albert the Great in Weymouth, siding with archdiocese officials who targeted the church for closure as part of a restructuring plan.

Parishioners have occupied St. Albert the Great since Aug. 29 to protest the closing of the church. They sued, seeking an injunction that would have barred the archdiocese from selling the church buildings and other assets.

In denying that request, Judge Thomas Connolly rejected the parishioners' claim that the church belongs to them and not to the archdiocese.

He did not, however, dismiss the lawsuit altogether, leaving the parishioners with some hope that they could still prevail in trying to keep their church from closing.

"In making this finding, the Court fully appreciates the hurt and suffering and loss suffered by the plaintiffs," Connolly wrote in a footnote to the ruling. "The Court simply is prohibited by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution from involving itself in such a dispute between members of the Church."

Archbishop Sean O'Malley announced in May that 82 parishes would be closed in a major restructuring brought on by falling attendance and economic woes caused partly by the clergy sex abuse scandal that began in Boston.

Parishioners at the targeted parishes have fought the closings in a variety of ways.

On Sunday, parishioners at St. Anselm Church in Sudbury began their own occupation in anticipation of that parish's Wednesday closing.

Colin Riley, a spokesman for the St. Albert's parishioners, said they would continue to press their case in court.

"We will not leave the property," he said.

The Rev. Christopher Coyne, a spokesman for the archdiocese, said church officials hope Wednesday's ruling will help them open a dialogue with St. Albert's parishioners and end their occupation of the church.

He said the archdiocese is looking for a mediator to help resolve the standoffs and acknowledged concerns that parishioners from other churches scheduled to close by the end of the year will also decide to stage sit-ins.

Public schools not up to requirements

BOSTON (AP) — About 400 of the state's public schools are failing to meet federal standards in math and reading and some could face a possible state takeover.

State education officials planned to release the federal government's watch list for failing to make sufficient progress in raising student performance at a news conference Wednesday afternoon. According to The Boston Globe, more than 20 percent of the state's schools are on the list, double last year's number.

Dozens of schools have underperformed for five straight years, opening them up for state takeover, officials said.

At least two Boston schools, the Tobin K-8 School in Roxbury and Marshall Elementary School in Dorchester, failed to meet federal standards for the sixth straight year, the Boston Herald reported.

Even schools that have performed well on the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System exams were labeled underperforming because of a new provision in the federal No Child Left Behind law. The change allows schools to be labeled "in need of improvement" because a single group of students failed to meet standards in one of up to 18 categories.

In the middle-class suburb of Marlborough, for instance, school committee members expressed frustration that the district will formally be identified as needing improvement, despite strong gains in nearly every grade. Marlborough's fourth-grade special education students did not reach the math benchmark.

"It's really frustrating to have that label because of one subgroup," committee member Elaine Martel said.

Holyoke superintendent Eduardo Carbollo said most city schools fell below federal standards, in part because student attendance at some schools was below the 92 percent requirement.

New grades mirror nation's schools

College consortium and the other schools in the university system.

The grading changes affect both undergraduates and graduates. Compromises were made between the Academic Matters Council and the Graduate Council to make the system of grading between undergraduates and graduates uniform. This will make it easier for professors, who will no longer have to use different systems of grading for their classes, Atallah said.

Undergraduates taking courses in the 600-level won't have the Pass/Fail option, but may be able to take their courses Satisfy/Fail (to Satisfy, you need a C grade), like graduate students.

500-level courses are available with more flexible options. The P/F option exists for undergraduates and the S/F option exists for graduate students. Graduates taking undergraduate level courses will now have the full spectrum of grades from A to D and F and are able to take courses P/F.

So far, no officials involved in the transition to change the grading system can recall any major objections being raised to the transition. Pyle said that the changes have no relation to the problems experienced with SPIRE over the past two weeks.

Hurricane Ivan closing in on New Orleans

Traffic crawls along the Louisiana coastline as residents flee the oncoming hurricane.

By Allen G. Breed
Associated Press Writer

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — With 135-mph Hurricane Ivan closing in with frightening intensity, this flood-prone city scrambled Wednesday to get people out of harm's way, putting the frail and elderly in the cavernous Louisiana Superdome and urging others to move to higher floors in tall buildings.

Along some 300 miles of threatened coastline from Louisiana to the Florida Panhandle, the churning surf, ominous clouds, swaying traffic lights and escalating winds were all the reminders some people needed to take cover from a storm that made a slight turn north on a path that could bring it ashore early Thursday at the Alabama-Mississippi line, near Mobile, Ala.

"If we turn up dead tomorrow, it's my fault," said Jane Allinder, who stayed stubbornly behind at her daughter's French Quarter doll shop to keep an eye on her cat.

Ivan's eleventh-hour turn may have spared this bowl-shaped region from a direct hit, but forecasters said everyone from New Orleans to the Panhandle should be worried because even the tiniest adjustment in the storm track could change where Ivan comes ashore by hundreds of miles.

Hurricane-force winds extended out 105 miles from the Category 4 storm, meaning a large swath of the Gulf Coast could get slammed with a storm surge of 10 to 16 feet and up to 15 inches of rain. After reaching land, Ivan threatened to stall over the Southeast and southern Appalachians, with a potential for as much as 20 inches of rain.

Ivan's monster waves — some up to 25 feet — were already destroying homes along the Florida coast Wednesday. Twelve-foot waves boomed ashore at Gulf Shores, Ala., eroding the beach. A buoy about 300 miles south of Panama City registered waves over 34 feet high.

"We're leaving today. All this is going under," surfer Chuck Myers said along the beach at Gulf Shores. "We surfed it all day yesterday. It was glorious."

At 5 p.m. EDT Wednesday, Ivan was centered about 125 miles south of the Alabama coast and was moving north at 14 mph.

Of the roughly 2 million who fled the path of the storm, often in bumper-to-bumper caravans on highways turned into one-way evacuation routes, 1.2 million were from greater New Orleans, a city particularly vulnerable to hurricanes because it sits below sea level, between the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain.

Officials warned that the levees and pumping stations that normally hold back the water may not be enough to protect the city.

Police began clearing people off the streets, enforcing a 2 p.m. curfew.

"I think it's safe to say we will have flooding in this city," said Mayor Ray Nagin. However, he contradicted a statement from his emergency preparedness director that the city needed at least 10,000 body bags to handle possible drowning victims.

Thousands of tourists were believed stranded in New Orleans, along with 100,000 mostly inner-city residents without cars. The mayor advised them to resort to "vertical evacuations," suggesting they take shelter in buildings taller than two stories. If that is not possible, he said, they should go into an attic and take equipment with them that would let allow them to cut through the roof and get out.

Rick Pfeifer, a salesman from Washougal, Wash., was stuck in New Orleans with no flights out and no cars to rent after arriving earlier this week for a National Safety Congress convention. His storm rations included as many chips, pretzels and bottled water as he could buy.

"I'm going to ride it out in the high-ground area of the city," he said wryly. "Fourth floor in a good hotel, with a good bar."

Frail, elderly and sick residents unable to get out were moved to the 72,000-seat Louisiana Superdome, where 200 cots supplanted the dome's usual tenant, the New Orleans Saints.

LuLinda Williams wept after dropping off her bedridden grandmother, who is on oxygen, at the Superdome. Only one family member was allowed to stay with each patient, so Williams left her daughter.

"I thought they'd let the family stay with them," Williams said. "Where are the rest of us supposed to go now? How are we supposed to know she's OK?"

The city decided against opening the Superdome to able-bodied people. The last time that happened, during Hurricane Georges in 1998, the 14,000 refugees nearly did more damage than the storm itself. Countless televisions, seat cushions and bar stools were stolen, and workers spent months cleaning graffiti off the walls.

As the storm drew near, streets along Mississippi's Gulf Coast were all but deserted, and homes and businesses, including its 12 floating casinos, were boarded up. Winds howled across Louisiana's bayous with enough force to topple trees and knock out power.

"We heard a loud pop, and I thought, not already," said Harold Plaisance, who had been sitting on the porch watching the storm in the fishing village of Lafitte.

Freshman Future 201: further words of wisdom

Matt Brochu

Last week I played the part of Professor Trelawney and predicted the events that will occur throughout the current freshmen's first year of college. But writing a column directed at freshmen is like yelling at your roommate's annoying girlfriend. Even though you hope it'll get the message across that you won't allow tampon storage in the medicine cabinet, it will most likely fall upon deaf, 18-year-old ears. The thing is most freshmen don't even know where they are right now, let alone that UMass has a newspaper, so I don't know what to do except to give you part two of my confessions.

Dear Freshmen,

The last few weeks have probably been an unfamiliar whirlwind for you kids, a stomach-turning contrast of tearful goodbyes and drunken hellos, the only constant being your above average Blood Alcohol Content and your growing hatred for your roommate's unhealthy addiction to Funyuns. You'd be surprised, there's quite a few of you who were well on your way to failing out of this place before classes even started. And that's OK. Some parents will even go for the, "college isn't for everybody" excuse. The problem is, most employers won't.

You guys scampered into the wonders of college life two weeks ago like a bunch of untrained puppies, 4001 Dalmatians running around Amherst, causing mischief and sniffing each other's butts. But since I can't physically go out and newspaper the Patterson hallways myself, I will do you a service and read your collective paws again:

You will sleep through entire classes by mistake and wake up with no recollection of turning off your alarm even if you sleep on the top bunk. You will wake up one morning in a room you've never seen before, maybe in the study lounge, maybe wearing boxer shorts that aren't even yours. You will be reminded on a Saturday morning of the ridiculous amount of food you ate the night before by the empty calzone box at the foot of your bed and the marinara stains all over your white pants. You will roll into a Purple Lot after 10 p.m. and you will drive slowly up and down each aisle before settling on a spot in the last row along the tree line, even though you clearly could've gotten the same spot 10 minutes before. You will whine to someone about the school's unnecessary language requirement.

You will "take a break" from your long-distance boyfriend because these relationships never work and it would just be a gigantic waste of time, effort, and potential hook-ups. You will break up with your long-distance boyfriend when it hits you that "taking a break" is more miserable than being together, and you initially called it "a break" not only because you were too nice to admit it was definitely over, but also because you wanted a back-up plan for winter break. You will go home for winter break and you will hook up with your long-distance boyfriend because he isn't quite so long-distance anymore.

You will have the sudden urge to punch your RA in the face. You will drink an entire bottle of that dark, purpley-blue Powerade before bed one night and when you go to the bathroom the next day your poop will be green (if this is untrue, I will personally compensate you for the price of the Powerade). You will do so much damage to your cumulative GPA that averaging a 5.1 over the next six semesters won't get you a "cum" or a "laude" on your diploma. You will wonder why I didn't make a sexual reference in that last sentence.

You will completely overdress for class the first few weeks, probably outfits you've never worn, probably with complicated shoes that make you taller than me. You will realize that no one cares what you wear to class at UMass. You will resort to wearing sweatpants and flip-flops, and you will be a hell of a lot more comfortable walking from Southwest to Lederle. You will save the "Pretty Woman" outfits for when you go out and one weekend you will be hit on by a grad student with brown eyes, dark hair, and an amazing body who writes for the school paper. You will realize that person is me. You will then hang all over the guy standing next to you and claim that he is your boyfriend, even though it's obvious to me, and everyone else at the party, that he's gay.

So when these things happen, just smile and know that I told you so. But as far as the rest of the year goes, I plan on doing a mailbag column every once in a while, an idea I blatantly stole from ESPN.com's "Sports Guy". So send all questions, comments, egregious omissions, advice requests, anthrax envelopes, marriage proposals, fruit baskets, and strip-o-grams to mjbrochu@schoolph.umass.edu. Just be aware that there's a good chance I'll make fun of you publicly, and if no one emails me, I'll probably just make stuff up.

Truly madly deeply,
Matt

World Perspectives

Jen Kim

So it has begun. A new throng of freshmen scrambling aimlessly to their classes while desperately trying to memorize the campus map in their heads, the sounds of bumpin' music blaring out the dorm windows as the first couple weeks of hardcore parties commence, the excitement and thrill of reuniting with the old friends you haven't seen since last semester, and the one and only orientation week of activities, social events and guest speakers that are actually worthy to check out. These are just a few first moments in the start of a new school year that I will be missing out on.

I experienced a grueling, three-day voyage that included a two-day stopover in Fiji and an eleven-hour layover in the LAX airport. The International terminal was my temporary home for the duration of that time, kind of like Tom Hanks in "The Terminal," but not quite to that extreme. I then finally made it to Wollongong, New South Wales Australia, my home for the next five months. As soon as I stepped out of the Sydney airport, I was greeted by gusty winds and rain, both of which were not part of my painted collage of kangaroos, koalas and constant rays of sunshine that I had in mind.

Despite the stereotypical images that the media portrays of Australia, kangaroos are not hopping around the streets nor are koalas hanging around in the trees where I am living.

Despite the stereotypical images that the media portrays of Australia, kangaroos are not hopping around in the streets nor are koalas hanging around in the trees where I am living. It took me a good month into my time here to actually witness a kangaroo in their habitat (at a national park). But alas, koalas are still yet a figment of my imagination.

I arrived in their winter season, meaning the worst it has gotten for weather is in the low thirties with a mix of rain and wind. Unlike the New England winter season I'm used to, I rarely had to layer and bundle up to take a ten-minute walk to my classes. Speaking of which, walking to class at UMass is a piece of cake compared to walking to "uni" (they refer to the university, class, and campus by this nickname) here. The residence halls at the University of Wollongong are not even on campus. On-campus housing refers to what we consider off-campus housing. The residence hall in which I am in (it's the farthest one out of all of the residence halls from "uni") is a 45-minute walk to campus. To think that I once complained how far Southwest was from the rest of campus!

Luckily, we have a shuttle that transports us from our residence halls to "uni". However, there is always a catch. The catch is we have to pay seven dollars for 10 rides, and this is not included in our program fees. Absurd? I think so! This is when I got smart and invested some money into a second-hand bike. Most students here usually bike or take the campus shuttle to "uni." It is rare and rather courageous seeing students hike it to class over the bridges and through the mean, opposite-side-driving streets of Australia. So my fellow UMassers, be grateful with our oh so beloved PVTA system and take full advantage of it! I know I am definitely taking full advantage of my bike here. Often times, I'll see students riding their bikes to town, pubs, bars and restaurants just for a cheap and yet healthy mode of transportation. It's quite the workout but at the end of the day, you're able to relax with ease in your dorm room knowing that you've done your share of exercise for the day.

It's a great feeling coming back to your dorm room and doing whatever you please without worrying about waking up your roommate or being 'sexed-out'. Ah, the luxuries of having a single. It's actually fairly common to have a single here. In fact, there are no doubles in my residence hall at all! Instead, we live in suite-style units. It is very similar to the Sylvan suites but not as isolated. Also, the single rooms here aren't as storage-closet as they are in Sylvan. My room is quite spacious (I'm able to fit seven people comfortably sitting) and I don't have to worry about colliding into any furniture every time I move like I would have in the Sylvan singles. The rooms come fully furnished including bed linen, a pillow and a blanket. I share my suite with another American and three other Australians. Our common room includes a kitchen sink with cupboards, a refrigerator, and a kitchen table with a booth to accommodate it. We are also blessed with cleaners that come in weekly to tidy up our individual and common rooms, and the bathroom! Oh, the hard knocks of dorm life in Australia!

For now "I'm flat out like a lizard drinking!" (Aussie slang translation: "I'm in a hurry!").

The five-year plan

Ben Feder

My first grade teacher, Mrs. Leach, was a fibber, or at least she didn't tell us the whole deal when it came to our future.

"You can be whatever you want to be," Mrs. Leach would say to us bright-eyed impressionable youths. "Great," I remember thinking, "I want to play with Legos for the rest of my life and when I'm grown, I will own a Lego factory." Unfortunately, there was no sign-up sheet for future careers, no magic job fairy to seal my fate in the Lego business. All I had were misconceptions of the job market and a pocket full of Lincoln Logs.

Now if I had known that many factors come into play when selecting a job, I would have made a more realistic goal for a profession. But little did I know that supply and demand, the economy, job market, and one's sheer determination all affect what one does in life. Sure you can be whatever you want when you grow up, but are you willing to work for it? The answer to this question, unfortunately for many, is no. People are lazy procrastinators by nature and enjoy the easiest options over anything else. I am no exception. It's not that the past four years at UMass have been a waste. On the contrary, the extra year I'm about to embark upon has given me a lot of crucial insight about the real world.

Hope your company likes sharing your twin size bed and won't complain about the Nintendo Power poster plastered to your wall either.

First of all, you graduate in four years and then you get to be an adult, fully equipped to make your fortune in this great world. Plenty is for the taking I suppose, but wait, first you will have to make a pit stop at your parents' house for oh, say, two to three years. Better clean out the old action figures from the closet because when you bring a date home, you don't want anymore explaining to do after the "I'm still looking for my own place" excuse dies out. Hope your company likes sharing your twin size bed and won't complain about the Nintendo Power poster plastered to your wall either (There's nothing to be ashamed of. How else were you going to find the warp whistle in Super Mario Bros. 3?).

Another thing about returning home is that you time-warp back to your pre-college days where your life comprised of being a bitch to the man and having to deal with your folks who just don't understand. But hey, Mom does make turkey sandwiches just the way you like them. And after he makes you mow the lawn, take out the trash, and look for a job, Dad's not that bad of a guy either. Plus you get to drink with the old man, a moment that the fellow has been anticipating for a while. Since now he can use the alcohol as an excuse to yell at you for being away at college for four years and not returning with any athletic achievements or scholarly merits to call your own. It's all right, your folks go to bed much earlier now anyway.

The third fact is the reality that even though your surroundings are similar, you are no longer 18. You can't get away with anything anymore. You didn't become a successful engineer, entrepreneur, or doctor. Your old friends are gone, have lost touch with their roots, or are working at the gas station down the road because they failed out of the same Ivy League school that they bragged about getting into in the first place.

Plus a whole new group of 18-year-olds have taken over. Fresh with the taste of their dreams in their mouth, the community looks to these young college-bound minds with hope that they can succeed where you have failed. Where you have realized your own shortcomings in a world where gravity seems much stronger, these young kids are going to a weightless wonderland to test their opportunities. Now your unsuccessful persistence turns to bitter resentment, and that is what it means to be in the real world. To take your indifferent, disaffected college days, ball them up, swallow your pride, and test the waters in a shark infested sea of possibilities. Only this time, the sharks seem much bigger.

Taking all of this into consideration, I say, "thank you for the five-year plan." To my friends out there trying to make it on their own and figure out where they will tack up their hard-earned diplomas, to you I say, "Good luck ... I'll be rooting for you here on the inside."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WELCOMED BY PROBLEMS

Ah, fall. Back at college. Same room, but wait, new toilets in many dorms. UMass is renting the Hampshire Mall and running buses every fifteen minutes? This year is different! No paper towels in the guy's bathroom for Webster 3. Van Meter bathrooms smell like urine and never get cleaned. Worcester DC has no napkins, while Hampshire DC has a full basket on every table. The ground around the library is torn up. Central's housing is no better; walking to Franklin DC is like an obstacle course from an old Nickelodeon show. Ther is no hot water in some Central bathrooms. There is no cold water at first in Webster's bathrooms and no nozzle handle on the showers in Webster 3, at least.

This is just the beginning of a list of complaints we could build. I'm starting to wonder where my room and board funds went. You rented the Mall out for a night and offered discounts on items, and then our napkins disappear from the DC that services much of campus, and construction makes the other nearby DC a long walk. Start a project to raise the library and the paper towels then vanish from our bathroom. They install new toilets, and in turn we lose functionality from the online system that manages our classes, finances, and the rest of our lives at UMass for weeks and call it an upgrade. I had to fight for five days to drop a class and add a new one. Please, UMass. I love you, but you've got to shape up.

A MISTAKEN WAR

Bush sent our troops into combat without needed protective equipment? Shame on Bush, he is the one who rushed our brave young men and women into a mistaken war in Iraq.

But as always, Bush hides behind the blame game, even if in doing so he is caught admitting that he is a failed leader. To wit, Bush accuses his critics of supposedly voting against a measure that would have given our brave troops bulletproof vests. In making the charge Bush is admitting that he went ahead and placed members of our armed forces into harms way without this vital protection. Or, did our troops really have such equipment, and Bush is just using the safety of these brave people for his own political gain?

Unprotected or not, these young men and women have done a magnificent job in combat in Iraq, but the politician in the White House has screwed it up. Daily our troops accept the reality of facing death and danger, while, back in Washington, Bush and his neo-cons spin fanciful tails of denial, offer happy talk. In place of accomplishment, and trash the character of anyone who demands that our soldiers in the field receive the kind of leadership that matches their daring, determination, and valor.

UMass learns The Art of Living

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

SPIRE malfunctions, long lines and high prices at the Textbook Annex, relationship drama, family problems, ever-growing piles of homework — let no one say that the life of a University of Massachusetts student is a simple one. Today's college students are faced with so much stress that it's no wonder the faces you see strolling to class on any given Monday are filled with anxiety, agitation and tension. Anyone actually living life is guaranteed to be living with some amount of unease. Show me a person who is not stressed out and I'll show you some one who likely took one of the Art of Living Foundation's courses.

The Art of Living Foundation, started by Sri Sri Ravi Shankar in the early 1980's, is a not-for-profit organization that focuses on the healing and energizing power of breath itself. AOL spread from one man in India to a current span of 135 countries and over four million people. Amherst is home to one of the 15 centers located in New England.

Last night the ninth floor of the Campus Center played host to an Art of Living seminar titled "Science of Breath." Taught by five-year member of the organization

Bonnaroo and a Phish farewell mark the end of music's muddiest summer

Who knew that I'd spend the best parts of my 19th summer knee-deep in mud? Not my employer, that's for sure. Taking a week off in June was bad enough, but requiring a second vacation in August saw me deciding between my job and Phish. The choice was obvious. My parents didn't understand either. They looked pretty confused when I demanded that they not throw away my sandals, barely recognizable underneath layers of Mother Earth.

Bonnaroo Festival
Centeroo
Performance Field and Festival Village
Mansfield, Tenn
June 11, 12, 13

But, closest to home of course were my own expectations. Upon rolling into Tennessee, it became pretty obvious that I had in no way readied myself for what was to come.

I was not prepared to take in the neo-gospel funk of Robert Randolph's pedal steel at three in the morning, aided and abetted by six-string magicians Eric Krasno and Luther Dickinson. Similarly, I was not prepared to catch the last half hour of Primus' set once Randolph and company had bid us goodnight. I was not prepared to walk back to my tent as the sun rose. Colonel Claypool's low-end ramblings secured safely between my ears. I was not prepared to watch on as my favorite guitarist conducted a symphony orchestra beneath the cover of southern skies. Trey Anastasio blew a lot of minds that night, and opened a lot of ears. Phish's breakup is killing me too, but I can't wait to see what Trey does next. If his set in Tennessee is any indication, it's going to be pretty intense.

And if it's anywhere near as intense as Jazz Mandolin Project's performance, it should be pretty nasty. As nasty as the Project's originals "The Country Open" and "Oh Yeah," turned inside out before an excessively enthusiastic audience? Maybe as nasty as the Project's Led Zeppelin medley? It's possible. Maybe as nasty as their drummer, former Anastasio bandmate Jon Fishman?

Hopefully. To watch Phish's namesake thrash around behind his kit in a jazz setting was a sight to see. There was no escape from the masterful percussionist's drum roll detonations, sly cymbal crashes and tasteful fills.

Likewise, there was no hiding from Marc Ribot's Y Los Cubanos Postizos jazzy salsa, or Soulive's sultry super-funk. Both groups laid it on thick. Soulive especially, with special guest Adam Deitch of Lettuce fame tearing it up on drums (if you witnessed the boys putting down "One in Seven" with Deitch, you saw something special).

But, in the end, aside from all this music, and all these bands, what sticks out most in my mind is the mud. Who knew there'd be that much mud at Bonnaroo?

Eve makes friends in low places

Original Sin
Eve

I should have realized this was a red-flag situation from the start. Instead, I saw it as somewhat romantic. Maybe even exciting. It wasn't a common situation a person just happens to fall into. But it seemed to make perfect sense on that particular day. I decided to drive the long way home.

It was almost dark, which meant I had just enough time to enjoy the beauty of my surroundings, rows of trees aligned either side of the long, winding road. Not a house nor a car could be seen for miles. I was in the middle of nowhere. And I was alone. Until I wasn't.

I glanced in my rear view mirror and noticed a male driver with a New York license plate speeding up behind me. I slowed down to let him pass and noticed he slowed down as well. "What is this guy doing?" I asked myself. He refused to pass, and I refused to let that bother me. I glanced at my flashing-empty gas light and focused my attention on my new destination. I took the one and only upcoming exit off the desolate road and pulled into the one and only small town gas pump. So did he. Maybe he needed gas too? I felt relieved with the thought and filled just enough gas to get me on the road and back home.

Two miles later I felt an intuitive urge to look once again in the rear view. There he was, and now I was annoyed. I rolled down my window and put my hand out as if to say "what?!" and he flicked his high beams. "That's it. I've had it," I said. I pull over on the side of the road and jump out of my car and so does he. "I'm not following you, I promise," he says as he approaches. "I am new around here and you looked cute and I don't know anyone, so ..." He was in his late twenties, slightly overweight, and severely balding. However, completely harmless and apparently very lonely.

"So you decided to make new friends by running me off the road?" I said rudely. He smiled subtly and answered, "I just couldn't let you go." His comment caught me off guard, but it was a great line.

This was one of the most hopelessly romantic situations I could have possibly been in. So we talked and he was hilarious. "Why don't you join me and my friends tonight for dinner?" I asked. His eyes widened and he jumped at the invitation. I told him where to meet us and we parted.

Dinner went incredibly well and somehow he managed to charm everyone at the table. I was happy with the results and as the night came to an end, I told him to call sometime.

I had a restless sleep that night. This was maybe because I had the house to myself for two nights, or maybe I instinctively felt something wasn't quite right. I had nightmares of being followed, cold anxious

'Silver City' draws inspiration from Dubya

By David Germain
Associated Press

TORONTO (AP) —To paraphrase an old Steve Martin bit: Some politicians have a way with words; others not have way.

Like George W. Bush, Dickie Pilager is the latter. A pivotal character in writer-director John Sayles' new political satire and murder mystery "Silver City," Dickie blunders his way through a campaign for Colorado governor with such pithy pledges as "keeping the infrastructure in place, where it belongs, is a priority."

The character is based on President George W. Bush in his first campaign for Texas governor, with Dickie the son of a successful conservative politician.

Sayles figures Bush's oratorical shortcomings are fair game.

"Being articulate is part of the job. If you can't explain yourself to the American people, how are you going to handle diplomacy?" Sayles told The Associated Press at the Toronto International Film Festival, where "Silver City" played in advance of its theatrical release Friday. "For instance, right at the beginning, right after 9/11, George Bush used the word 'crusade.' For everybody in the Arab world, that's like going to Israel and saying, 'I have the final solution to your problems,' you know?"

Again like George W., Dickie (played by Sayles regular Chris Cooper) encounters an embarrassing incident that has to be explained away. For Bush, it was mistakenly shooting a protected bird while on a dove hunt with reporters in 1994.

Sayles lays out a tougher obstacle for Dickie, who hooks a dead body with his fishing line while preparing for a photo opportunity with the press. The incident has Dickie's handlers on the defensive as they put a disgraced reporter turned private eye (Danny Huston) on the case to dig into the matter and keep it from damaging the campaign.

The ensemble cast also includes Richard Dreyfuss, Daryl Hannah, Maria Bello, Michael Murphy, Tim Roth, Kris Kristofferson, Ralph Waite, Mary Kay Place, Thora Birch and Billy Zane.

Sayles originally had Cooper — an Academy Award winner for "Adaptation" — in mind to play a wealthy puppetmaster for the Pilager clan, a role that went to Kristofferson, while Dickie was going to be handled as more of a comic part.

"We started thinking maybe we don't need a comic actor but somebody who's a really good dramatic actor, and what's comic about him is how serious he is and how bad he is at it," Sayles said. "Because we need him to have enough weight as an actor so he is a bit scary at the end. So you realize this guy's going to win and he's going to be able to do some things. He's not going to remain a laughingstock."

Dickie's faltering remarks include such warnings to hoodlums as, "You do the crime and by God, you're going to have to take your lumps." He astutely observes, "If you're going to have a front burner, which is where you want your priorities ..." Associates call him "Dim Dickie," and his chief handler (Dreyfuss) explains away Dickie's superficiality by saying, "Dickie is not really a fine-print kind of guy. He's more intuitive."

Watching Dickie on TV with the volume turned down, Huston's character quips, "He seems a lot more gubernatorial with the sound off."

Yet as the movie progresses, Dickie grows more confident and sure-tongued, the same as Bush, Cooper said.

"I think over the years, he's gotten a lot better. I mean, frankly, early on, you were taken aback at his performance, at his off-the-cuff remarks," Cooper said. "And listen, my son has severe disabilities, so I think I'm free enough to say, he may have a little dyslexia or whatever."

While Dickie's ramblings are reminiscent of the president's clumsy phrasings, "Silver City" is intended as much more than a mere Bush-bashing flick, said Huston, whose character begins as an apathetic loser but regains his sense of outrage as he roots through the political muck of the Pilagers and their associates.

"I think that John is also making that point to the American voter who feels that he can't make a difference because it's all too rotten, that if one is inquisitive enough, then maybe that spark can be ignited," Huston said.

Hannah hopes "Silver City" might inspire more issue-driven films.

"What would be really phenomenal is if it made a lot of money, and then a lot more political movies were able to be made again like they were in the '70s, when people weren't so afraid to go out there and take a chance creatively and make things that provoke people and get them to start thinking about issues and discussing them," Hannah said.

Such noble wishes aside, bashing Bush was at least part of the intention for the liberal-thinking Sayles and his like-minded cast.

"What I really want to see is a debate between Dickie Pilager and George W. to see who can say the least while saying the most," co-star Belko said. "Who is actually the most inarticulate. That's the debate I would like to see. I think George W. would win hands down."

Director John Sayles, left, claims that his new film "Silver City" is not merely a "Bush-bashing flick." He hopes to ignite the spirit of American voters with his work. Actor Chris Cooper, right, brings Bush-like Dickie Pilager to life on screen. A regular in Sayles' movies, Cooper turns in an impressive performance in "Silver City."

Akshaye Sikand, a graduate student at UMass studying Industrial Engineering, the hour and a half seminar gave a brief introduction to the Foundation's central breathing technique, Sudarshan Kriya.

"How long can you go without eating?" Sikand asked. "Many days, people can fast for five or more days. How long can you go without sleeping? Three days, maybe. But," he continued, "how long can you go without breathing?"

Sikand began "The Science of Breath" telling the 25 guests in attendance a bit about what the Art of Living is. It is not a religious group, he said, and he emphasized the educational aspect of the programs the foundation offers. In addition to the innumerable centers located around the globe the Art of Living has also extended its hands to at-risk youths and over 50,000 incarcerated individuals.

"The Art of Living course has been at UMass for four or five years now," Sikand said, "and in that time 400-500 people have taken the course. I have yet to meet a single person that said [the techniques we taught] didn't work."

The idea behind the techniques is that breathing can alter one's physical, emotional and mental well-being. "For many, breath is a one-way street," Sikand said. "You get relaxed and you exhale; happiness places an emphasis on the inhale. But we think of breath as a two way street ... breathing affects emotion." If a person can control his or her stress then he or she can increase alertness, as well as improve relationships and establish healthy sleeping patterns.

For many the urge to be skeptical about these breathing techniques is strong, but Sikand presented the crowd with medically proven results that these practices do indeed work. A brief video featuring renowned physician Dr. Jim Farrow was shown presenting documented studies done by the Art of Living Foundation as well as medical professionals at other institutions and all studies reached the same conclusion: any way you look at it these techniques improve your quality of life. Cancer, HIV, dysthymia, asthma and depression are just a handful of the ailments that the Art of Living courses not only claim to alleviate, but actually do.

"It's fascinating hearing about all the research," said Craig Surette, a senior Medical Anthropology major at UMass. "I think it's really cool to see the insight and wisdom of another culture is being explored and proven by western science."

"The Science of Breath" is a sort of introduction to the teachings of the Art of Living Foundation's six-day course starting Sept. 30. For a fee of $135 participants will have over 20 hours of Sudarshan Kriya training.

"Once you take the course," Sikand said, "you are essentially a member for life." Students will have access to free weekly sessions as well as the opportunity to retake the course whenever they wish for no charge.

For those that missed last night's "Science of Breath" event, there will be two more sessions tonight at 5:30 p.m. and 7 p.m. in room 909 of the Campus Center. Sikand and other teachers and students of the Art of Living will be available to answer questions. Those interested in enrolling in the six-day course will have the chance to reserve their place as well.

Anyone who is looking for a way to reduce stress or just trying to find a way to kill time on a Thursday evening should make their way down to the Campus Center and give a listen to what Sikand and the Art of Living have to say.

"What is the difference between noise and music," asked Sikand, summing up the evening. "If all the instruments are playing out of sync, you have noise; if they are together you have harmony ... life is much like music, life is like art, and this is the art of living."

sweats thinking about being watched. As the sun rose I checked my phone to see the exact time. Instead I saw two missed text messages. Two text messages from him. Both consisted of 160 words describing how much fun he had the very few hours before.

I looked out my window and saw something on my car. My heart was racing. I walked outside and slowly picked up a note that was taped on my windshield. "Hi again! Just wanted to say thanks again for last night. See you later," he said. How did he know where I lived? A wave of nausea ran through me and I hurried inside. Just as I reached my front door I looked behind me and froze with fear. He was here. He calls out my name and jogs toward me. I then realized how harmless he really was and became enraged. "What the hell are you doing? Are you crazy? Get off my property now!"

He tried to explain himself, but the romance had already been ruined. "And don't even think about calling me again," I said as I slammed the door. He never did call me again. I never saw him again, either. Only until a few weeks later did I read about him in the paper: 27-year-old arrested and charged with possession of narcotics, possession of arms and a very bad temper. I was shocked but not surprised. All I could think was how lucky I am to have a very bad temper myself.

Goodbye, Barbara

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Mind you, Barbara Walters isn't retiring.

But she's about to do something almost as notable: Relinquish her role as co-host of "20/20" after a quarter-century with that ABC newsmagazine. Walters, who has interviewed almost every big shot worth interviewing and whose own celebrity matches many of her subjects, is ready to retreat from the spotlight, a little.

But first: Friday at 9 p.m. EDT, Walters will preside over a two-hour retrospective of many of the 740 interviews (but who's counting?) she has done for "20/20."

Then on Sept. 24, she will air one more: a conversation with Mary Kay Letourneau, the former sixth-grade schoolteacher who went to prison for having sex with a student.

After that, she plans to spend a whole week with her daughter Jackie at a spa in Southern California. "I don't know when I've gotten away for a week," she says, "without getting called on something."

Time to take the phone off the hook!

"I know that everybody said, 'She'll never stop working. They'll carry her out feet first,'" says Walters, looking relaxed and stylish in a mint pantsuit at her desk a few days ago. "But I wanted to get out of the week-in-week-out grind. And I wanted to leave at the top. I didn't want to leave and have people say, 'Is she still there?'"

Walters, who marks her 75th birthday next week, has been reliably there on the nation's TV screens since the 1960s, as the first female co-host of NBC's "Today."

She became a "20/20" fixture in 1979, joining forces with its then host Hugh Downs following the disastrous experiment that had brought her to ABC three years before: co-anchoring the evening newscast with Harry Reasoner, who quickly made it clear he wanted no one alongside him, especially a woman.

"Very difficult, very painful," Walters calls that misadventure. But at "20/20" she flourished, and, in 1984, became its co-host.

Now replacing her at the anchor desk next to John Stossel will be Elizabeth Vargas.

"But I'm not retiring," Walters says. "I'll be doing specials that I can pick and choose. We're already working on 'The 10 Most Fascinating People of 2004,' for December. I'll continue to do 'The View' (the morning chat and interview hour she started in 1997 whose panel of women she joins a couple of days each week). I might even do an interview for '20/20' from time to time.

"But in terms of anchoring '20/20,' I'm done," she declares.

It's an apt occasion, then, for revisiting Walters' past with a special like "25 on 20/20," whose breadth is reflected by its organizational breakdown: Presidents and first ladies; other world leaders; figures from Sept. 11; killers, scandalmongers and scoundrels; celebrities.

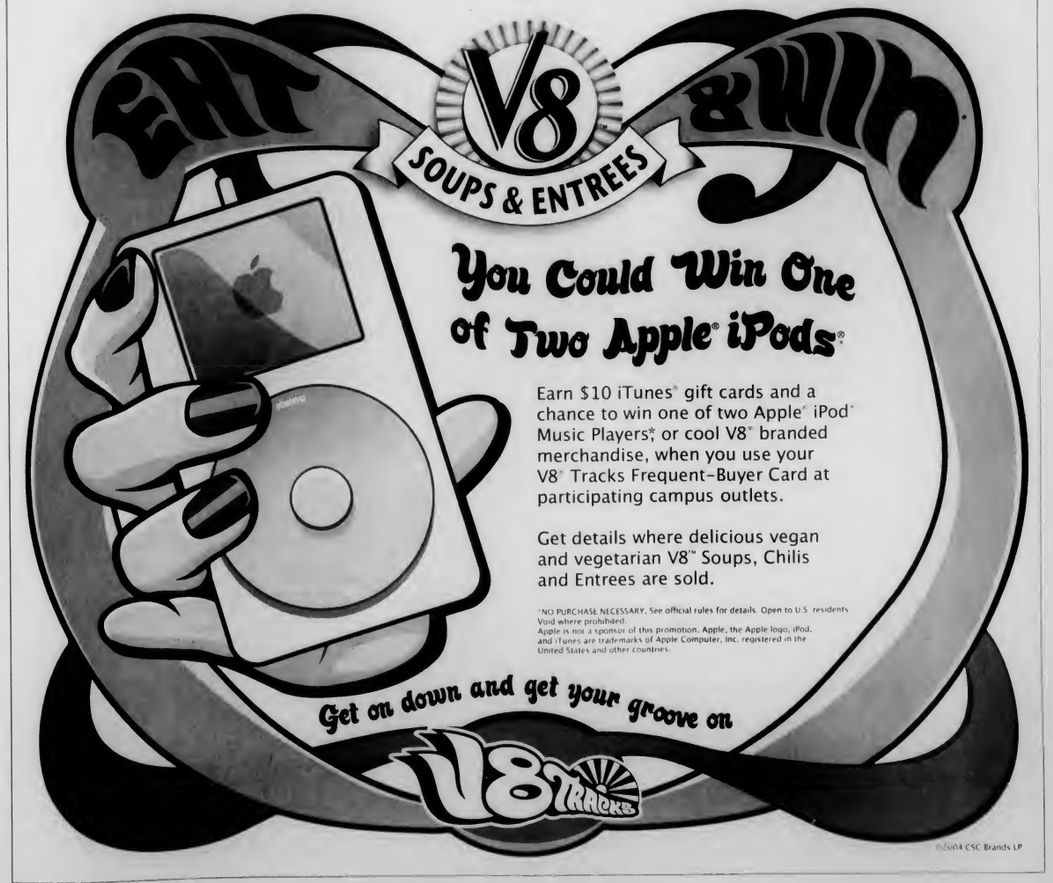
A final section, human interest, not only draws on Walters' inspiring sessions with Christopher Reeve (paralyzed from the neck down after a 1995 horseback-riding accident), but also the subject Walters decrees her most memorable: Bob Smithdas, a teacher and poet with a master's degree who has been deaf and blind since he was 4. In 1998, Walters profiled him and his wife, Michelle, who's also deaf and blind.

There are excerpts from interviews with Richard Nixon, Michael Jackson, Erik and Lyle Menendez, Margaret Thatcher, Muammar Gadhafi, Monica Lewinsky, Bing Crosby, Robin Givens and Mike Tyson, Elton John, Ronald Reagan, and dozens more.

You almost certainly saw some of them when they first aired. But packaged in this greatest-hits collection, they have a heightened impact. "25 on 20/20" is a time capsule packed with a generation's worth of personalities, each certified by the ritual of sitting down with Barbara.

"What a life I've had!" says Walters, herself a bit surprised to take stock. "I never expected this! I always thought I'd be a writer for television. I never even thought I'd be in front of a camera."

The special takes note of Walters' stature as a pop culture phenomenon, with clips of several memorable impersonations of her, including Gilda Radner's classic Baba Wawa sendup.



Walters also corrects the record, or tries to, concerning her "What kind of tree would you be?" question, an indelible part of any Barbara Walters spoof. She insists it was asked just once, long ago, in direct response to Katharine Hepburn's likening herself to a tree. The obvious follow-up: What kind of tree?

That may be Walters' best known question, but in her long career there have been thousands more, each strategically sprung.

Like this favorite: "I ask, 'What's the biggest misconception about you?'" Walters says, "and they'll tell you all the things they were never gonna tell you."

Barbara Walters will end her 20-year tenure on ABC's news show "20/20" tomorrow night.

Brady, Patriots strive to keep getting better

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) — Going 17-1 in games decided by fewer than seven points isn't enough for Tom Brady. Neither is throwing for 335 yards and three touchdowns in his season opener.

He could be 18-0 in those starts. And he did have 12 incompletions among his 38 passes in that first game last Thursday night against the Indianapolis Colts.

There are plenty of ways the two-time Super Bowl MVP for the New England Patriots wants to get better.

"Oh, man, where do I start?" Brady said Wednesday. "There's so many things that I'd like to improve on — my recognition of what the defense is doing, making better decisions with the ball, especially late in the game."

The Patriots beat the Colts 27-24 but failed to put the game away on offense. On Indianapolis's last two series, the defense recovered Edgerrin James' fumble at the New England 1-yard line. It then came up with a 12-yard sack that forced Mike Vanderjagt to try a 48-yard field goal that he missed on the next-to-last play of the game.

"We really had an opportunity at the end of the game to finish the game out the way we wanted to and we put our defense back on the field and that's not something we wanted to do," Brady said.

But his touchdown passes to Deion Branch, David Patten and Daniel Graham — and his impressive 111.2 passer rating — made the win possible.

"Nothing Tom does surprises me," center Dan Koppen said. "He's more prepared on this team than anybody. He got back there and got in a groove."

But that didn't satisfy Brady.

"Tom was very accurate, but every week there's room for improvement," said David Givens, one of seven Patriots with receptions in the opener. "Unless he's completing 100 percent of his balls, he's not going to be complacent."

He's not at all happy about his lone loss by fewer than seven points. It came in the fourth game last year, 20-17 at Washington.

The Patriots trailed 20-3 midway through the third quarter but made it 20-17 and had a first down at the Washington 45-yard line with 1:39 left in the game.

"When you look at those last three plays, it was just ridiculous that we didn't do anything with the ball," Brady said.

Operating from the shotgun, he threw an incompletion toward Branch then hit Larry Centers for a 5-yard gain. Centers then ran up the middle for 2 yards to the 38, but Brady's next pass — and the Patriots' final play — was an incompletion toward Graham.

"That lasted through the rest of last season," Brady said. "That just kind of gnawed at this whole team. That was an embarrassing loss and performance late in the game."

The Patriots haven't lost since — a stretch of 16 regular-season and playoff games. Five teams share the NFL record of 18.

They can make it 17 straight on Sunday in Arizona, then have a bye week before visiting Buffalo on Oct. 3.

The Cardinals have just one winning season in their last 19 but have a new coach, Dennis Green, and suffered a narrow 17-10 loss to St. Louis on Sunday. With a new staff, studying last year's game film may not help the Patriots a great deal.

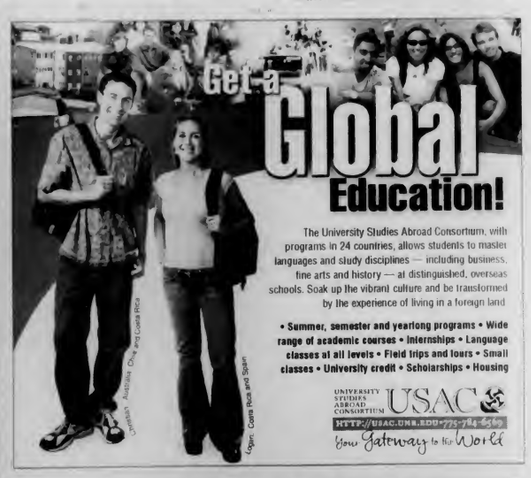
corner awarded to UMass. The second shot, attempted by Katelyn Woolfrey, was saved by Boston goalie Erin Prediger. Jaime Bawden caught Woolfrey's rebound and struck quickly for a shot on goal that was also saved by Prediger. The Maroon and White received a third penalty corner on the play, but was unable to create a shot.



Teaming up for an intense attack, Tigchelaar and Patricia Borneo kept the heat on the Terriers in the second half. Borneo, with help from Tigchelaar, managed to dribble the ball all the way from the Massachusetts circle to BU's. This attempt was also thwarted by Prediger, who earned three saves in the victory.

The heartbreaker of the game was Caitlin Beresin's attempt to tie the game in the last few minutes of play. Tigchelaar led her the ball directly in front of the net, enabling Beresin to take a clean shot, but it narrowly missed the net, crashing against the pole and ricocheting away.

"It was a different team tonight," Shea said, comparing last night's game to last weekend's tour in Maryland. "We really have the ability to be great. The last piece of the puzzle is just putting the ball in the net.

Northeastern University
Location: Brookline, Mass.
Nickname: Huskies
Colors: Red & Black
Home Field: Parsons Field (7,000/artificial turf)

Head Coach: R.E. "Rocky" Hager (first year)
2003 results: 8-4 (6-3; 3rd A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 14/8
2004 Predicted finish: 2nd in North Division

Former Temple coach Rocky Hager takes over for his first year with the Huskies, and has the pieces in place for a solid squad in 2004.

Senior quarterback Shawn Brady is back for his fourth and final year, and has an impressive record of 21-9 as a starter to go along with 17 touchdown passes and a 139.4 efficiency rating in 2003. Gone is bruising tailback Tim Gale, but the shifty Anthony Riley gives NU a great deal of speed at the position and should be a nice fit. Wide receiver Cory Parks has caught a conference-best 16 touchdown passes over the last two seasons, and returns with Quintin Mitchell as targets for Brady.

On defense, everything revolves around All-American linebacker Liam Ezekiel. One of the elite defensive players in the nation, Ezekiel led the A-10 in tackles in 2002 with 145 and posted 140 more last season in moving to the top of the program's career lists in that category. Defensive end James Aboni is a solid run-stopper up front and will have to team with Ezekiel in compensating for the loss of five starters.

University of New Hampshire
Location: Durham, N.H.
Nickname: Wildcats
Colors: Blue & White
Home Field: Cowell Stadium (6,500/grass)

Head Coach: Sean McDonnell (five years, 23-35)
2003 results: 5-7 (3-6; Tied 8th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 18/4
2004 Predicted finish: 4th North Division

The Wildcats have had a tremendous start to 2004, knocking off both Delaware and Division I-A Rutgers on the road despite losing starting quarterback Mike Granieri for the season.

Freshman Ricky Santos has stepped in admirably under center for UNH and has put up amazing numbers in being named USA Today's Freshman Player of the Week on Monday and moving the Wildcats into the Top 10. The Bellingham native has completed 40-of-51 passes for 531 yards and six touchdowns to give him an unheard of passer rating of 200.79, and joins tailback R.J. Harvey in giving the 'Cats a pair of playmakers in the backfield.

As is the case on offense as well, nine starters return to give UNH an experienced defensive group led by free safety Aaron Thomas and defensive end George Peterson. A big question for the coaching staff will be in the middle, where sophomore Tim Beckett looks to fill the hole at nose tackle and backup punter Mark Rutberg moves in to play linebacker. After stopping no one in 2003, the defensive front seven is undersized and will have a lot to prove this year.

University of Rhode Island
Location: Kingston, R.I.
Nickname: Rams
Colors: Light Blue, Dark Blue & White
Home Field: Meade Stadium (7,460/grass)

Head Coach: Tim Stowers (four years, 18-26)
2003 results: 4-7 (3-6; Tied 8th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 14/8
2004 Predicted finish: 5th in North Division

Former Georgia Southern coach Tim Stowers continues to struggle with both sides of the ball at URI.

Multi-talented quarterback Jayson Davis is back to run the team's flexbone offense, but has lost a plethora of talent around him, including Wendel Williams. Halfback Jason Ham will look to carry the load for the Rams after finishing third in the A-10 with 1,119 rushing yards in 2003, but the run-first offense is designed to have the ball spread around. Either slight-b built sophomore Jerell Jones or junior Calvin Poole must pick up some of the slack. One positive for Stowers on offense is the return of four starters along the offensive line, namely senior Dustin Bayer.

After finishing 114th out of 121 nationally in total defense last season, Stowers revamped his coaching staff and shifted to a 4-3 alignment in hopes of having URI on the upswing. Only four players return from last year's group, and big question marks abound with a completely new defensive front and a pair of new cornerbacks.

Hofstra University
Location: Hempstead, N.Y.
Nickname: Pride
Colors: Gold, White & Blue
Home Field: James M. Shuart Stadium (15,000/artificial turf)

Head Coach: Joe Gardi (15 years, 107-52-2)
2003 results: 2-10 (2-7; 10th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 14/8
2004 Predicted finish: 6th North Division

Another tough campaign may be in store for the Pride, but there's little doubt that Joe Gardi's team will go down passing.

Quarterback Bobby Seck returns from a broken hand suffered last season to direct the run-and-shoot offense, and has star wide receiver Marques Colston back to work with. At 6-foot-5, 225 lbs., Colston may emerge as one of the conference's top pass-catchers this season, and will team with Issac Irby in attempting to replace all-conference dynamo Ricky Bryant. When Hofstra does run the ball, it will be sophomore Terry Crenshaw who will carry the load.

On the other side of the ball is where the question marks arise, as the Pride will employ at least six underclassmen within the unit. LeVarr Starr is a consistent defensive back and linebacker Cole Hales has become a decent player, as has defensive end Dan Garay and his 13 sacks over the last two seasons, but look for teams to move the ball on Hofstra early and often.

Villanova University
Location: Villanova, Penn.
Nickname: Wildcats
Colors: Blue & White

Head Coach: Andy Talley (19 years, 132-77-1)
2003 results: 7-4 (5-4; 4th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 16/6
2004 Predicted finish: 1st in South Division

There is a great deal of talent returning on the Main Line, where veteran coach Andy Talley has the Wildcats geared up for a run at rival Delaware for the South Division title.

Marvin Burroughs has supplanted Joe Casamento as the starter for now, and his mobility and big-time arm will compliment the talent around him well. Multi-faceted tailback Terry Butler is back, along with receivers Noble Champen, Phil DiGiacomo, J.J. Outlaw and John Dieser to give VU an offensive potentially un-matched in the conference outside of Orono.

Defensively, 'Nova may be even stronger. Middle linebacker Brian Hulea was second in the A-10 in tackles last season, and returns alongside Allyn Bacchus and Bryan Adams. Up front, star defensive end Jamil Butler joins Darrell Adams to move bodies while free safety Raymond Ventrone is the best defensive back in the conference who doesn't call Amherst home.

University of Maine
Location: Orono, Maine
Nickname: Black Bears
Colors: Blue & White
Home Field: Morse Field at Harold Alfond Stadium (10,000/artificial turf)

Head Coach: Jack Cosgrove (11 years, 60-66)
2003 results: 7-5 (5-4; Tied 4th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 13/7
2004 Predicted finish: 1st North Division

The Black Bears are as talented as any team in the Atlantic 10, and will strike fear into defensive coordinators' hearts with arguably the best collection of skill players in the conference.

A-10 Rookie of the Year Ron Whitcomb is back to lead the offense after a stellar freshman campaign in which he threw for 2,428 yards and 21 touchdowns and also set a conference freshman record with an average of 220.7 passing yards per game. He will once again have the luxury of handing off to Walter Payton Award finalist and former Amherst Regional star Marcus Williams, who ran for 1,327 yards and 12 touchdowns as the Bears' feature back in 2003. Senior wideout Christian Pereira joined Whitcomb and Williams as all-conference honorees in 2003, and should do so again as Maine's go-to receiver this season.

Maine ranked No. 20 nationally in total defense last year, but must account for six new faces within the unit. Defensive tackle Pat Piau looks to pick up where Dennis Dottin-Carter left off along the front, and Manauris Arias will look to help hold together an almost entirely new secondary.

Towson University
Location: Towson, Md.
Nickname: Tigers
Colors: Black, White & Gold
Home Field: Minnegan Field at Johnny Unitas Stadium (11,198/artificial turf)

Head Coach: Gordy Combs (13 years, 70-56)
2003 results: 6-6
Starters Returning/Lost: 11/11
2004 Predicted finish: 6th in South Division

The Tigers have a lot to prove in their first season as a member of the Atlantic 10 — mainly whether or not they have the talent to compete in one of the nation's elite I-AA leagues. Towson is 17-29-1 all-time versus A-10 opponents, and are expected to struggle mightily in league play this season.

Junior quarterback Anthony Melzi returns after throwing for 1,589 and nine touchdowns, and will be handing the ball off to a first-year starter in sophomore Kerry Milles. Also new on offense are split end James Byroads, tight end Ryan Collins and the entire right side of the line, including the league's longest name in center Konstantinos Kosmakos.

On defense, Towson is led by leading returning tackler Bryan Fitzpatrick and senior P.D. Moore, who has a reputation as a solid playmaker. Holding down the front seven will be senior tackle Mike Collier, along with nose guard Rich Stallone.

University of Delaware
Location: Newark, Del.
Nickname: Fightin' Blue Hens
Colors: Royal Blue & Gold
Home Field: Tubby Raymond Field at Delaware Stadium (22,000/grass)

Head Coach: K.C. Keeler (two years, 21-7)
2003 results: 15-1 (8-1; Tied 1st A-10) Division I-AA National Champions
Starters Returning/Lost: 16/6
2004 Predicted finish: 2nd South Division

The defending National Champions lost the reigning conference offensive and defensive Players of the Year in quarterback Andy Hall and defensive end Shawn Johnson, and K.C. Keeler's squad has a lot of questions to answer following an opening night loss to UNH.

Nonetheless the Hens are always in the mix, and return a solid corps of talent on both sides of the ball. Missouri-transfer Sonny Riccio takes over the reigns of the offense as the new signal caller, and has a talented trio of receivers to work with in David Beler, Justin Lung and Brian Ingram. The Hens will miss star offensive lineman Jason Nerys a great deal, but should have success running the football with feature back Sean Bieler and speedster Lonnie Starks.

Defensively, leading tackler Mondoe Davis and fellow linebacker John Mulhern will anchor the front seven while electrifying all-conference cornerback Sidney Haugabrook leads the secondary.

College of William & Mary Location: Williamsburg, Va.
Nickname: Tribe
Colors: Green, Gold & Silver
Home Field: Walter J. Zable Stadium at Cary Field (13,279/grass)

Head Coach: Jimmye Laycock (24 years, 159-110-2)
2003 results: 5-5 (4-4; 6th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 16/6
2004 Predicted finish: 3rd in South Division

William & Mary will likely go as far as Lang Campbell will carry them. One of the league's best quarterbacks, Campbell took over for departed legend Dave Corley Jr. and completed 182-of-285 for 2,296 yards and 22 touchdowns, along with just seven interceptions. He finished second in the A-10 in total offense while leading the league in passing yards per game and passing efficiency and winding up second on the team in rushing.

Jon Smith is back to carry most of the load at tailback, but it will be up to Dominique Thompson and John Pitts to make up for the loss of one of the conference's all-time greats in the graduated Rich Musinski.

Junior linebacker Travis McLaurin is a solid tackler for the Tribe, as is junior free safety James Miller. Coach Jimmye Laycock hopes that five returning starters among the front seven and just one in the secondary will translate into success stopping opponents on defense.

James Madison University
Location: Harrisonburg, Va.
Nickname: Dukes
Colors: Purple & Gold
Home Field: Bridgeforth Stadium (14,000/artificial turf)

Head Coach: Mickey Matthews (five years, 27-31)
2003 results: 6-6 (4-5; 7th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 18/4
2004 Predicted finish: 4th South Division

After another sub-par season, Mickey Matthews continues to struggle in attempting to turn the Dukes around. Oft-injured quarterback Matt LeZotte is back to run the offense, and is currently among the top five in school history in four different passing categories after throwing for 1,753 yards and 13 touchdowns last season.

JMU should have success running the football with four returning starters along the offensive front opening holes for the young but talented combination of Maurice Fenner and Alvin Banks, but a pair of new receivers and a new tight end may limit the offense's overall effectiveness.

Isai Bradshaw is as good as they come in the A-10 at the linebacker position, but will likely be searching for help stopping opponents in Matthews' nickel system. LeZotte's younger brother Tony will join a secondary anchored by cornerback Clint Kent and safety Rodney McCarter.

University of Richmond
Location: Richmond, Va.
Nickname: Spiders
Colors: Red & Blue
Home Field: UR Stadium (21,319/grass)

Head Coach: Dave Clawson (first year)
2003 results: 2-9 (1-8; 11th A-10)
Starters Returning/Lost: 12/10
2004 Predicted finish: 9th in South Division

Ultra-talented quarterback Stacey Tutt is back as a full-time starter after taking over for Bryson Spinner late last year. He will have a solid wideout in senior Jake Schools to work with, but must compensate for the loss of four of the team's top five rushers from a year ago.

Defensively the Spiders will once again look to defensive tackle Clifton Coker to lead the charge, along with linemate Brian Burnette. Eight of the team's top ten tacklers are back from a year ago, including senior free safety Antoine Newsome.

Richmond basketball team, is a threat to run on his opponents, which could create some chaos in the UMass defense on Saturday. Coach Don Brown prepared his team for the scrambling quarterback by plugging running backs Justin Montgomery and Lorenzo Perry in at quarterback during drills this week at practice.

"(Tutt) can beat you by himself with his feet. If we don't take care of him on the perimeter, he's not like some quarterbacks where they can hurt you for 10-15 yards; he can hit a home run against you," Brown said.

The Maroon and White faced a very similar type of quarterback in Chris Brown last week in their game against Colgate. Brown finished the game with 59 rushing yards on 11 carries. He was 27-for-48 in the air with 272 yards and one touchdown, but he was also picked off three times.

Saturday's victory over Colgate was one of sweet revenge for Umass, who was knocked out of the playoffs by the Red Raiders last year. It was unfinished business for the players, but not as much for Don Brown, who was the coach for Northeastern University last season.

The tides are facing a different direction this week. Richmond coach Dave Clawson is also in his first year with a new program. He became the Richmond coach on February 23 after he left Fordham where he was the head coach for five seasons.

In 2002, Fordham knocked Brown's Northeastern squad out of the Division I-AA playoffs in the first round with a 34-29 score. This was the only time these two coaches have met in a game.

UMass will be going after its 500th program victory. It has a career mark of 498-491-51.

In order to reach that plateau, the Minutemen will have to cut down on their mistakes, primarily in the penalty department. They were flagged 11 times in their win last week and 20 times in their victory over Delaware State.

"We brought in an official (to practice) last Thursday for that. It wasn't as much just downright disregard for discipline; it was more effort," Brown said.

Other than that, the team has looked almost flawless. Tim Day has been outstanding at quarterback, completing 30-of-40 passes for 389 yards and six touchdowns with only two interceptions to begin the season. He leads the country with a pass efficiency rating of 229.58 in his first season as the full-time starting quarterback.

Wide receiver Jason Peebler has contributed mightily to Day's numbers as Peebler has caught nine passes for 305 yards. He also has scored two touchdowns in each of the team's first two games.

Heading into the season, it appeared as though the defense would be the backbone of this young team, and to this point the defense has been very tough on its opposition. They didn't allow a single point for the first 87:58 of the season, and they have forced five turnovers through two games.

Richmond's defense was eaten up in the team's first game of the season against Division I-A opponent North Carolina State when they lost 42-0. Still, though, Richmond hasn't allowed a gain of over 25 yards to this point in their 2004 campaign.

The Spiders' defense was led last week by sophomore Adam Golobuski who recorded a career-high 13 tackles. The linebacker had a season high eight tackles last year against UMass as a freshman. He was the first true freshman to play for Richmond in nine years.

Richmond running back David Freeman, a converted safety, rushed for a career high of his own against VMI for 130 yards last week.

"He certainly looked like the real deal against VMI. If you don't tackle him, he is going to make you miss," Brown said.

The Spiders' top threat at receiver is Harry Wilson, son of former San Diego Charger Harrison Wilson, who had 104 yards and two touchdowns on Saturday. This was the first time the Spiders have had a running back and receiver eclipse the 100-yard mark during the same game since 2002.

Richmond has two coaches who have close UMass ties. Offensive line coach Bill Durkin played for the Minutemen from 1989-1993. In 1993, Durkin was a first-team All-American guard and he was named one of the Yankee Conference's Top 50 players of all time.

Special teams coordinator Ben Albert was a defensive lineman for the Maroon and White from 1991-1994 and was an All-Yankee Conference first-team selection in 1994. Both former players became assistant coaches at UMass after their collegiate playing careers ended.

Massachusetts has won the last two games in its series against Richmond including last year's by a 30-17 score to increase its all-time series lead to 12-8. Steve Baylark rushed for 144 yards in that game, and Rich Demers gained 124 yards on the ground. Peebler hauled in seven passes for 143 yards and three touchdowns.

UMass has a 5-4 mark against Richmond at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Minutemen must stop Tutt

UMass' Brandon London and Michael Torres, among others, Tutt is listed at 6-foot-2-inches, 230 lbs., and is anything but a prototypical drop-back passer. Nonetheless, new head coach Dave Clawson has brought a pro-style offense in from Fordham to replace former coach Jim Reid's option attack, and it has forced Tutt to improve his presence and pocket passing and rely less on his rushing ability.

In a loss to Division I-A North Carolina State and a win over Virginia Military Institute, the Tappahannock, Va. native threw for a combined 296 yards and four touchdowns while maintaining a stellar 125.1 efficiency rating. Yet unlike his three starts at the end of last season, Tutt carried the ball just 11 times for 20 yards and did not find the end zone with his legs.

Nevertheless, after Tutt ran for a season-high 70 yards against the Minutemen in Amherst last season and was third on the team in receptions despite playing receiver for just eight games, Brown is keenly aware of the potential game-breaking ability the Spiders' quarterback has on the ground.

"We've used [running backs] Lorenzo Perry and Justin Montgomery at the quarterback position in practice during the week," Brown said. "We obviously need to prepare for speed at that position, and that's just something that we can't always simulate to the degree we need to with our quarterbacks.

"He's a great player with a lot of ability, and we need to be ready for him. He's the kind of guy you can't mess around with, or he's gone."

In the Spiders' first two games under Clawson, Tutt has had the luxury of an effective tailback in junior David Freeman, who's averaged 6.4 yards per carry in 2004. However if the Minutemen continue to play stingy against the run, as they have against both Delaware State and Colgate, the Spiders may be forced to rely on Tutt to carry the offense again as he did after senior quarterback Bryson Spinner went down last season.

"He's obviously the main guy for them, the offense goes through him." Brown said. "We need to play smart on defense and keep him in front of us and out of the end zone."

And in fact, the Minutemen may be more equipped to contain Tutt than they were in 2003. With a defensive unit that has clearly gotten younger and quicker along the front seven and more experienced in the secondary, defensive coordinator Keith Dudzinski will likely have a lot of options to throw at Tutt, options that begin and end with junior middle linebacker and captain Serge Tikum.

"Tikum's our guy, and he's going to be out there any time the defense is out there," Brown said at the UMass Athletic Association's weekly sports luncheon. "He's got a lot of ability and he's only getting better at things like reading pulls.

"Our defense begins and ends with him."

Minutemen to kick off A-10 schedule against Richmond

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team is coming off their most anticipated game of the season last week, a 30-20 flossing of Colgate. The Minutemen are 2-0 and riding high, as they have looked extremely solid to this point in this young season.

UMass' biggest enemy this week may not be its opponents, but its confidence, which could prove fatal as it could be caught in this "trap game" tUMass takes on the defending national champion Delaware Sep. 25th when it opens up their Atlantic-10 schedule against Richmond on Saturday at 1 p.m. at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

"I guess there is a little bit of a cause for concern, but I think our guys realize how important this game is. And we really need to hold serve at home," UMass coach Don Brown said on Wednesday.

The Spiders (1-1, 0-0 Atlantic 10) are fresh off a 34-7 triumph over VMI last week, their largest margin of victory since a 35-7 win over UMass in 2001.

Richmond quarterback Stacy Tutt is coming off multiple career highs when he threw four touchdown passes and passed for 233 yards against VMI.

Stopping talented QB a must

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Make no mistake about it; the Richmond Spiders will go as far as Stacey Tutt will take them in 2004.

For the third consecutive week, the Massachusetts football team will be facing a mobile quarterback, but that cannot prepare them for the challenge they face on Saturday afternoon at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Tutt, a former wide receiver who also joined the school's men's basketball team over the winter, is widely considered one of the more electrifying and dynamic players in the Atlantic 10, and has added an improved dimension to his game since being named the Spiders' full-time starter during camp.

Minutewomen fall to Boston University at home for sixth consecutive defeat

By Paula Aden
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team suffered a narrow loss last night at Garber Field against in-state rival Boston University. The 1-0 victory improved BU's record to 2-3, while the Minutewomen continue a stretch of six consecutive losses, still without a win this season.

In last night's loss, the Maroon and White came close to finally breaking their losing streak, but ultimately failed after a critical defensive lapse. The game-winner was scored with about 17 minutes left in the second half when forwards Sarah Shute and Jen Joyce charged the circle during a moment of defensive weakness for the Minutewomen.

Goalie Christine Tocco was left alone to defend the cage against the joint attack, and was unable to prevent the score. Tocco attempted to cut off Shute and Joyce at the top of the circle, but they managed to evade Tocco and beat her back to the net. Shute was credited with the game's sole score, while Joyce earned an assist on the goal.

"We left [Tocco] naked at the end there, and it hurt," Massachusetts coach Patty Shea said. "We didn't have a defensive balance, and that's an issue of awareness."

Tocco achieved eight saves in the loss, bringing her season total to 56, which puts her in third place nationally for saves. A key defensive save was also made late in the second half. After Tocco deflected the ball initially, the Terriers' offense managed another shot on goal. Erin O'Brien dove after the ball, knocking it out of play and earning a defensive save.

After a scoreless first half, Massachusetts came out strong after halftime. Boston dominated the first half of the game, outshooting UMass 9-1. In the second half, the Maroon and White answered each offensive attempt from BU with a shot of their own, with each team earning eight shots in the second period.

With a cohesion not seen in previous games, the Minutewomen worked their offensive maneuvers skillfully in the second half, forcing the Terriers to put up a strong defense.

"I thought that tactically and technically, this was one of the best games UMass has played," Shea said. "They really played as a unit."

Kara Murphy started the second half with a strong offensive play. After a deflected shot from Murphy, the Minutewomen earned three consecutive penalty corners. Marije Tigchelaar took the first shot, which was blocked, but resulted in a second penalty

With last night's loss, the Minutewomen fall to 0-6 on the season.

Cross country to hold first home meet of 2004 season

By Martha Powers
Collegian Correspondent

Losing two out of your top five runners would have any cross-country coach nervous about the upcoming season. Such is not the case with Massachusetts men's coach Ken O'Brien.

The addition of six freshmen — three times as many as last season — to compliment the experience already in place has shown to be an effective combination.

"The difference is tremendous. The team this season is worlds apart from last year," O'Brien said. "Cross-country is a unique sport because it is basically what the name implies. Therefore, in order to train, the team has to travel up to twenty miles away from campus."

Will, so many new faces in place, it is up to the upperclassmen to assimilate the underclassmen to the different roads and trails. "My words through their eyes" is how O'Brien describes the responsibility the juniors and seniors hold. Since O'Brien may not see his team for miles at a time when they are training, he relies on the experienced runners to guide the others.

"It's due to the dichotomy of experience that forces the older guys to take the younger ones under their wing pretty quickly," O'Brien said. "They must take an active role in helping the underclassmen, and we have a great group of team leaders."

New training routes are just one of the changes that the freshmen are experiencing. College meets are double the distance of high school meets, and O'Brien has been coaching long enough to know not to expect anything at the home-opening contest this Saturday.

"This early meet is a great barometer to see how we stand and to see our potential for the remainder of the season," he said. "You never know until you see the freshmen in action. I expect some inconsistency. Stage fright can hit and you have 18-year-olds running against experienced 21-year-olds."

Maine has this experience. That will be the main advantage the Black Bears have over the Minutemen. Last year, UMass lost by one point to Maine, and O'Brien expects the competition to be just as tough this year.

"Maine lost only one man from last year, and it is going to be an equally difficult battle on Saturday. The race is going to come down to the last mile," O'Brien said.

Leading the Maroon and White on Saturday include senior captains Matt Clark and Andy McCarron. Clark excels on the track at shorter distances like the mile, but has stepped up to run the longer distances of cross-country.

"I anticipate this year to the best year of his four," O'Brien said.

McCarron, described by O'Brien as a "pure distance runner", finished fourth in the Atlantic 10 for the 10,000 meters last year and went on to finish seventh in the New England Championship just six days later.

Cross-country opens its home season this Saturday at 11:30 a.m. when Maine and Vermont come to Totman Field.

Red Sox sell out all 81 games

BOSTON (AP) — The Red Sox have sold out their entire 81-game home schedule for the first time in franchise history, the team said Wednesday.

On Tuesday, the Red Sox sold off their final scattered singles, standing-room only tickets and obstructed view seats, all of which are reserved for game-day sales.

Boston is the fourth team in major league history to sell out an entire season, joining the Cleveland Indians (1996-2000), the Colorado Rockies (1996) and the San Francisco Giants (2000).

"This remarkable achievement is a testament to the passion and commitment of the fans of Red Sox Nation as well as a credit to our exceptional sales force and ticket office," team president Larry Lucchino said in a statement.

With a capacity of about 34,000, Fenway Park, built in 1912, is Major League Baseball's oldest and smallest ballpark.

In recent years, the team's owners have added seating atop the left-field wall, known as the "Green Monster," and on the right-field roof.

"We are well aware that our loyal fans wish we had more seats to accommodate them," Lucchino said.

If all 81 scheduled home games are played, the Red Sox will surpass 2.8 million in home attendance, setting a club record for the fifth consecutive season.

Weather permitting; the Red Sox will finish the regular season with a streak of 145 consecutive home sellouts, dating back to May 15, 2003.

UMass wins dining award

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Correspondent

The National Association of College and University Food Services has once again bestowed the University of Massachusetts Amherst Dining Services with the Loyal E. Horton Residence Hall Dining Award this past spring. UMass Dining Services has received the award in four out of the past five years.

Dinning Services programs such as "Breakfast-on-the-Run," "Grab-n-Go Lunch" and "Create-a-Stir" propelled the University to win one silver and three bronze medals. Director of University Dining Services, Ken Toong, is especially proud of the school's emphasis on nutrition, variety, and educational programs.

"Food is like fashion ... kids want change," Toong said. "Our job is to ensure numerous choices are available so that they can choose from many healthy options."

Dining Services created a proposal that detailed the University's commitment to the importance of variety and nutrition in order to enter the contest. The nutrition variety seems to be an aspect of UMass dining that rings well with students.

"It's good that they always have a salad bar open. I'm a fan of that. And I like the fruit. Also, during the week they offer the wrap and omelet bar, soft serve ice cream, and sushi and pasta bars," said freshman student Luba Kogan.

In addition to the variety of food, UMass Dining Services offers a wide array of programs to continuously educate students. UMass is only the second school of higher education in the nation to offer an all-you-can-eat Sushi bar, and the only school to do so on the East Coast.

In the 2003-2004 school year, 24 specials were designed and offered throughout the year. Two such special programs, "Who Wants to be a Meal-ionaire" and "Nutrition Jeopardy," which awarded prizes to its participants, have been in operation the past two years. Campus vendors sponsor these events in an attempt to keep students interested and educated.

Two other events that happened last year, the Student Iron Chef competition and the Taste of UMass were both considered successful events. Dining Services will be having the "Meal of Fortune" program in March of 2005 and other programs throughout the year. Some special dining hall events are the cultural celebration of the Chinese New Year and a lobster special on Halloween, which will be back this year due to popular demand.

According to Toong, the dining commons on campus recently switched to cooking with canola oil. The change was made due to the health concerns from using vegetable oil, which contains higher levels of a more dangerous type of fat.

"We listened to the customer," Toong said.

UMass competed in the large school category for the award, which consisted of schools with over $8 million in revenue. The UMass dining revenue of $35 million ranks against such competitive heavyweights as Harvard University, Stanford University, and the University of California-Berkeley. Due to the fact that UMass is a state school, the administrators have less funding and resources to create a quality product than private schools.

Despite the impressive dining awards that UMass has received, the food on campus has not garnered positive interest from the entire student body.

"Let's just say my roommate and I spent $100 on food at Big Y yesterday," said sophomore student David Kozhuk said.

Students enjoy free food from various sponsors at the Taste of UMass in May 2004. The event is credited with helping UMass Dining Services recieve the Loyal E. Horton Dining Award.

Democracy Now! host speaks in Northampton on Saturday

By Amir Norman
Collegian Correspondent

Amy Goodman, host of the national daily radio and television program "Democracy Now!," is coming to Northampton, this Saturday, September 18, to speak on world issues.

The event will be hosted by United for a Fair Economy and Grassroots International committee and presented in partnership with the American Service Fair committee. Goodman will be at the Unitarian Society of Northampton and Florence located at 220 Main Street from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. A $10 donation will be requested at the door.

"We are sponsoring Amy because she is the primary reporter that is covering the issue of equality in the world," said Jerry Koch-Gonzalez, the president of the United for a Fair Economy board. "Whether it is the election, Iraq, or the Bush Administration, she is highlighting the issues of the inequality of America's economy."

The national tour marks the launch of her first book "The Exception to the Rulers: Exposing Oily Politicians, War Profiteers, and the Media That Love Them," SAGE, Every woman's Center, the Solidago Foundation, Odyssey Bookshop and the American Friends Service committee endorse the event.

In the book, Amy offers her "no-holds-barred" perspective on world events and the hidden motives behind those in power on subjects ranging from the deceptions of the George W. Bush's administration, war abuse in Iraq, to the corruption of media monopolies and corporate influence over the government. Amy Goodman attacks and exposes what she conceives to be the lies that put democracy at risk.

Amy Goodman began her career in community radio in 1985 at Pacifica Radio's New York Station, WBAI, where she produced WBAI's Evening News for 10 years. In 1990 and 1991, Amy and colleague Allan Nairn traveled to East Timor and witnessed Indonesian soldiers gunning down 270 East Timorese. The soldiers then beat Amy and Allan, fracturing Allan's skull. In 1996, Amy helped launch Pacifica Radio's, "Democracy Now!" where she has made several documentaries.

Two years later, Amy went to Nigeria, where her radio documentary "Drilling and Killing: Chevron and Nigeria's Oil

Hurricane Ivan ravages Gulf Coast

A condominium was destroyed by Hurricane Ivan in Orange Beach, AL. The category 4 storm is blamed for 18 deaths and extensive damage along the Gulf Coast near Mobile, AL.

By Pauline Arrillaga
Associated Press

PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) — Hurricane Ivan drilled the Gulf Coast on Thursday with 130-mph winds that inflicted far less damage than feared everywhere except Florida's Panhandle, where residents were left with surge-ravaged beachfronts, flooded streets and homes ripped apart by deadly tornadoes.

The storm was blamed for at least 20 U.S. deaths, most of them in Florida.

"We were prepared for the hurricane, but the tornadoes were bam, bam, bam," said Glenda Nichols, manager of the Microtel Inn in Marianna, Fla. "There was nothing we could do about it. I put all my guests in their rooms and told them to get in the bathtubs."

Ivan quickly deteriorated to a tropical storm after coming ashore. But forecasters warned it was not done yet: It threatened up to 15 inches of rain and flooding across the South, already soggy after Hurricanes Charley and Frances over the past month. And more danger could be on the horizon: Hurricane Jeanne is tearing through the Caribbean on a path that could take it into Florida early next week.

More than 2 million residents along a 300-mile stretch of the Gulf Coast cleared out as Ivan, a former 165-mph monster that killed 70 people in the Caribbean, closed in on an unsteady path.

Ivan came ashore near Gulf Shores Beach, Ala., around 3 a.m. But it was the Panhandle — squarely in the northeast quadrant of the storm, where the wind are most violent — that took the brunt.

Ivan spun off at least a dozen tornadoes in Florida, while creating a storm surge of 10 to 15 feet, topped by large battering waves. A portion of a bridge on Interstate 10, the major east-west highway through the Panhandle, was washed away.

Insurance experts put the storm's damage at anywhere from $5 billion to $10 billion.

The death toll included 13 in Florida, two in Mississippi, and one in Georgia. In Louisiana, four evacuees died after being taken from their storm-threatened homes to safer parts of the state.

Many of the millions of Gulf Coast residents who spent a frightening night in shelters and boarded up homes emerged to find Ivan was not the catastrophe many feared.

New Orleans, especially vulnerable to storms because much of it lies below sea level, got only some blustery winds, a mere two-tenths of an inch of rain and only some downed tree limbs. By Thursday morning, French Quarter tourists came out of their hotels to sip cafe au lait under brilliant sunshine.

"I leaves in the pool — that's it," said Shane Eschete, assistant general manager of the Inn on Bourbon Street.

"I know I'm going to hear from the Monday morning quarterbacks," said New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who had urged the metropolitan area's 1.2 million residents to flee three days ahead of the storm. But he added: "Look at the scenes from Mobile and Pensacola — that could have been us."

Mobile, Ala., a port city of 200,000 that had been in the bull's-eye of the storm, got a break by an 11th-hour shift to the east. Still, its historic oak-tree-lined Government Street was blocked with tree limbs, metal

CBS News fighting for reputation

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — CBS News is trying to restore its credibility after a week of questions about its report on President Bush's National Guard service — yet it may never conclusively know whether it was duped by fake documents.

The news division has acknowledged for the first time questions about the authenticity of documents used to support the story, and it has promised a stepped-up effort to get at the truth.

"They could have saved themselves a good deal of negative publicity and attacks if they had said that from the beginning," said Charlotte Grimes, a Syracuse University professor with a specialty in political reporting.

Internet watchdogs were the first to raise questions about last week's report, and CBS anchor Dan Rather's critics have been buzzing ever since.

An editorial cartoon in the Birmingham News pictured a door-looking Rather saying on camera, "There is not an anti-Bush media bias. And here's a memo to prove it."

The memos, purportedly written by Bush's late squadron commander, Lt. Col. Jerry B. Killian, indicated he had been pressured to sugar coat Bush's performance and that the future president ignored an order to take a physical. Several document experts say they look suspiciously like they were written on computer, not a 1970s-era typewriter.

CBS flew the late Killian's former secretary, Marian Carr Knox, from Texas to New York Wednesday for an interview, in which she said she believed the documents were fake but their content accurate.

While backing away slightly from the documents, CBS has always maintained — and Rather repeated on "60 Minutes" Wednesday - that no one has disputed the substance of the story: Bush received preferential treatment to get into the National Guard and didn't fulfill his requirements.

But CBS News President Andrew Heyward said "there obviously remain questions surrounding the documents and we're going to redouble our effort to get to the bottom of them."

CBS newsman Dan Rather is under fire due to allegations that a source provided falsified documents used in his news story.

U.S. concerned over test site

By George Jahn
Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — U.S. and European diplomats tentatively agreed Thursday to demand a new Iranian freeze on uranium enrichment by fall as they fine-tuned a draft resolution meant to deprive Iran of technology that could be used to make nuclear weapons.

But negotiations over the text being prepared for the International Atomic Energy Agency's board of governors were overshadowed by a U.S. charge that the U.N. atomic watchdog had kept silent about its concerns over a possible nuclear weapons-related test site in Iran.

"This is a serious omission," a U.S. official said, alluding to the lack of specific mention of the Parchin complex in a report that IAEA director Mohamed ElBaradei wrote for the board on the status of a probe into Iran's nuclear activities.

The U.S. official, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity, said the United States believed Parchin, southeast of Iran's capital, Tehran, was being used to test high explosives, possibly for use with nuclear weapons.

Both Iran and the IAEA denied the accusations.

"Parchin has nothing to do with nuclear-related activities," said Hossein Mousavian, Iran's chief delegate to the board meeting. He denied reports that the IAEA had asked to visit the site, but said agency inspectors could do so if they wanted.

IAEA spokesman Mark Gwozdecky said suggestions that the agency willfully omitted sensitive information were "totally baseless ... (and) not worthy of further comment." The ElBaradei report "reflects the facts in an objective manner, and we fully stand by them," he said.

A diplomat who keeps track of the agency's work said there was a veiled, one-paragraph allusion to Parchin in ElBaradei's report.

"The agency has discussed with the Iranian authorities ... information relating to dual use equipment and materials which have applications in the conventional military area and in the civilian sphere as well as in the nuclear military area," the paragraph reads.

Another diplomat familiar with the agency's thinking said Parchin was not specifically listed as a concern partly because the IAEA did not have enough evidence to do so but also so as not to tip the agency's hand and thereby jeopardize future investigations into the site.

A former U.N. nuclear inspector, David Albright, said that while Iran did not specifically turn down IAEA requests to visit Parchin, it "ignored" them. Albright, now head of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington, described the site as hypothetically having "the capacities that could be used to make high explosives for nuclear weapons."

The revelations on Parchin were likely to be used by Washington to push its case for a tough Iran resolution.

The 35-nation board suspended its meeting Wednesday to allow for back-room negotiations on the draft, and diplomats said the conference was not expected to reconvene until Saturday.

A version of the resolution being circulated late Thursday and made available to AP would express "serious concern" that Iran "has not heeded repeated calls from the board to suspend ... all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities."

The draft also expressed alarm at Iranian plans to process more than 40 tons of raw uranium into uranium hexafluoride, the feed stock for enrichment processes that can produce material usable in both nuclear bombs as well as the generation of electricity.

The text would have the board urge Iran to suspend all enrichment activities; call on ElBaradei to submit a report by November reviewing the past two years of his Iran probe; and demand Iran "resolve all outstanding issues and inconsistencies" that have fed suspicions about its nuclear program.

The wording made no mention of an Oct. 31 deadline — a date proposed by the United States, Canada and Australia for Iran to meet all the conditions. Instead it kept open the option of "further steps" if Iran was interpreted to have failed to meet the board's conditions by November — shorthand for possible referral of Iran to the U.N. Security Council, as demanded by the United States.

Iran is not prohibited from enrichment under its obligations under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty but faces growing international pressure to suspend such activities as a good-faith gesture.

Iran pledged to suspend enrichment a year ago, but international concern has grown that it did not fully honor the promise and has reneged on some of the suspension measures it did enact.

An IAEA report gave Iran some good marks for cooperating with the most recent phase of an investigation that began two years ago when it was learned that the Iranians had been running a clandestine nuclear program for nearly 20 years. But the report also said Iran must do more to banish all suspicions that it is wants to develop nuclear weapons.

U.S.-born terror suspect freed after two years of captivity

By Paisley Dodds
Associated Press

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — A lawyer for an American-born terror suspect said Thursday that a deal had been tentatively reached with the U.S. government that will send the man to Saudi Arabia and spare him prosecution after being held more than two years without charge.

Yaser Esam Hamdi, who grew up in Saudi Arabia, could become the first American classified as an enemy combatant to renounce his citizenship to avoid prosecution.

"There is an agreement in principle for his release and it's now in the hands of the government," Hamdi's lawyer, Frank Dunham Jr., told The Associated Press.

John Novatsky, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, said negotiations were still under way.

Dunham said Hamdi had agreed to the deal's terms and was excited about returning to his family in Saudi Arabia, where he plans to continue his university studies.

The 23-year-old was captured fighting with Afghanistan's Taliban in late 2001 and held at the U.S. military outpost in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for three months before authorities realized he was a U.S. citizen. He was then transferred to a brig in South Carolina and later to the Norfolk Naval Base in Virginia.

Saying he was forced to fight for the Taliban, Hamdi had challenged his status as an enemy combatant, a classification given to the 585 detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay that affords detainees fewer legal protections than prisoners of war under the Geneva Conventions.

One restriction was not being allowed to see an attorney for months while in solitary confinement. But the Supreme Court ruled in June that enemy combatants may not be indefinitely detained without legal rights, allowing Hamdi to have a lawyer and contest his detention in federal court.

Hamdi weighed how much longer he would have to remain in jail away from his family and decided it was best for him to return to Saudi Arabia even if that meant renouncing his U.S. citizenship, Dunham said.

Although he mentioned Hamdi's citizenship, Dunham would not confirm that was a condition and declined to discuss specific conditions of the deal.

But another lawyer involved in the case said the conditions included Hamdi's giving up his U.S. citizenship and not being allowed to return to the country of his birth. The second lawyer, who spoke to AP on condition of anonymity, said Hamdi could be sent to Saudi Arabia as soon as this week.

The Center for Constitutional Rights, which also reported the deal, said it could set a precedent for others being held without charge in the United States and at Guantanamo.

"The fact that they are letting Hamdi go without charges proves the importance of courts and attorneys. People ought to be screaming about this not just for what was done to Hamdi, but for what it says about what America has become," said Michael Ratner, president of the New York Center for Constitutional Rights.

Hamdi was born in Baton Rouge, La., where his father reportedly worked for an oil company.

signs, roofing material and other storm debris. The storm turned the night sky an eerie green with popping electrical transformers.

"The rain was going sideways. You could hear metal bending. It was just bad. It was my first one and there won't be a second," said Deb Harwick, who rode out the storm in a motel near Gulf Shores Beach, Ala.

Tornado warnings were issued across northeast Florida again Thursday, even as search-and-rescue teams were sent to check the rubble for any victims of the night-before twisters.

"It's sad," said a weary Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. "I don't know quite why we've had this run of storms. You just have to accept that."

More than 1.5 million homes and businesses from Louisiana to Florida lost power at the storm's peak.

In the Panhandle, destruction was seemingly around every corner. Huge magnolia trees had fallen across the streets, and the trunk of a 25-foot palm had snapped about eight feet off the ground. Bricks from St. Paul's United Methodist Church lay in heaps beside the building.

Traffic lights lay shattered in the road. Telephone poles leaned over at precipitous angles, the wires sagging to the ground or just feet above it.

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 2004 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Grading change will bring many benefits

Students at the University of Massachusetts will no longer have to explain to their parents what an "AB" or a "BC" is supposed to mean. UMass is finally moving from its unusual eight-point grading system to the more common eleven-point system. The movement to change the grading system has been in the works for several years now, spearheaded by students, professors and administrators.

The new system will allow for pluses and minuses to be applied to grades, which will ensure that grades are accurate representations of a student's performance in class. Students frustrated by receiving a course grade of AB for a percentage of 91, when other institutions would designate the 91 percent as an A- should be thrilled by the change. On the other hand, students who earn a 78 percent will no longer be able to hide under the cover of a BC, instead receiving a C+.

Christophe Courchesne, a former UMass student representative was one of those who made the push for change back in the spring of 2001. The change should have been done a long time ago in order for students to benefit from the additional feedback on their work, Courchesne said. According to officials involved in the process, no one has had anything negative to say about the change. Objection may occur, however, the majority of those it directly affects — professors and students — will find the transformation beneficial.

UMass is unique in many ways, but one of the biggest distinctions has been our grading policy. The current system is a rarity, and switching to a more conventional system will serve to bring the University in-line with other colleges and universities in the area, specifically those in the Five College Program. This is ironic, as UMass switched to the old eight-point system back in 1972 in an attempt to follow a national trend among other colleges.

The eight-point system was often disadvantageous to students applying to graduate or professional programs that did not understand what an AB meant; unsure of how to read an AB or BC, graduate programs often rounded down these grades to a B+ or C+, respectively. UMass students can now rest assured knowing that their grades will look normal when a prospective employer or administrator looks at their transcripts.

Now able to use a single grading sheet for courses enrolling both undergraduate and graduate students. Professors too will find the new system more usable. In all, the change makes for a more consistent system no matter what way you look at it.

Most likely, this change has finally been brought about simply because the plan was finally put into motion, not because the need is any greater now than it was last year or five years ago. "People were always chitchatting about it, it just needed someone to take a hold of it," said Courchesne. Now that the initiative has been taken, it will be a major step forward in making UMass a more rewarding and modern university.

Only one right choice

Johnny Donaldson

It's almost that time, that time when we must pick our national leader. The grand old United States of America is rounding the bend into the November 2nd elections, and the trumpets are sounding along both party lines. Their respective conventions are now done and over and now it's up to us, the people, to decide whom it is we want to follow in the next four years of our future.

Hopefully we won't make the wrong choice.

In a normal election year, it wouldn't matter which side you aligned yourself with and voted for. Democrat or Republican, it was your choice to form political biases and vote with whatever candidate best fit your leadership criteria.

But this is not a normal election year. This is an election year when the fate of our land hangs in the balance. Not to sound too hyperbolic about it, but if – and here's to hoping it is only a snowball's chance in hell it happens – if George Walker Bush is once again crowned President of the United States of America, then this country may not survive.

No president has done more to undermine the safety and liberty of this country than the man they have derogatorily christened "Dubya." The information is by now old news to most everyone from dyed-in-the-wool liberals to rabid conservatives grasping at straws to deny any implication of Bushian wrongdoing. Bush has taken our economy from one of the biggest surpluses in history to the biggest deficit, and sacrificed millions of jobs in the process. His environmental policies – those ironically named "Clean Air" laws – have done more damage than protection. His preemptive war, a violation of international treaties, racks up the casualties day after day and will result in a generation of citizens crippled – whether emotionally or physically – by the horror of an unjustified war.

He's cut funding to programs designed to help women's shelters and is pushing legislature to deny homosexuals the right to marriage. He, and the Republican Party, are angling to deny workers overtime pay and are attempting to make it harder for workers to unionize. He has denied connections to the Swift Boat campaigns that were meant to smear and tarnish John Kerry's war record, yet evidence shows that members of that campaign have connections to the Bush family.

People still believe that Iraq had something to do with 9/11. When in fact, no Iraqi has harmed an American on American soil in terrorist-related violence. In fact, the members of al-Qaeda that attacked that fateful day were all Egyptian or Saudi – a country Bush has strong allegiances to.

People still – STILL – believe that weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq. None existed.

People still believe that this war isn't about oil or power or pride. And Bush still tries to demolish our civil rights one by one.

Bush seems like a great guy to have a beer with. He's charming and accessible. But those aren't the qualities that should be priority in the make-up of a president. Kerry may not be the most charismatic man in the world – he may act like a block of wood, with a melting face to boot – but I doubt that he is as dangerous and corrupt as a member of the Bush clan. We need a leader who isn't going to "cowboy up" and become a trigger-happy loon when crisis arises. We need a leader who can bring back our old allies and make new ones, patch up old wounds, and dissolve hotheadedness and big business corruption. I don't know if Kerry is that guy, but Bush definitely is not. We have to make that gamble that he isn't going to be the worst president in our long, uneven history. Since Bushies like to call into question the patriotism of liberals, how about I leave any supporters of the Bush regime with this remark: a vote for Bush is a vote against America.

Who will be the last?

Stephen Post

"The purpose of propaganda is not to provide interesting distraction for blasé young gentlemen, but to convince, and what I mean is to convince the masses. But the masses are slow moving, and they always require a certain time before they are ready even to notice a thing, and only after the simplest ideas are repeated thousands of times will the masses finally remember them." – Adolph Hitler, "War Propaganda," "Mein Kampf"

Hitler would be proud. Bush and his confreres have done a stand up job of holding the line, staying on message, never flinching, never blinking, always asserting. In the drive to war, the Bush team hammered away at its core points: Saddam Hussein is an evil man; he has weapons of mass destruction; he gassed his own people; he supports terrorists, etc. The administration engineered convenient associations: al Qaeda – Iraq; Iraq – September 11th.

Repetition works. Even now the line has changed very little. So what if there were no weapons of mass destruction? Saddam Hussein was a weapon of mass destruction; Iraqis are better off, go ahead and ask them.

According to the latest Newsweek Poll [Sept. 2-3], forty-two percent of a pool of "registered voters nationwide" think, Saddam Hussein's regime was "DIRECTLY [their emphasis] involved in planning, financing, or carrying out the terrorist attacks of September 11th, 2001." Fourteen percent were "unsure."

What's more, the same poll found that fifty-five percent of respondents think the United States "did the right thing" in launching the Iraq war last year. This time, only half as many were unsure.

No amount of polling can bring back the dead. It is the Ides of September, and over a thousand U.S. service men and women are dead. As for Iraqi civilians – remember them – some twelve to fourteen thousand have died. This last figure is inexact mainly because no one is really counting. Still it continues.

But how do you ask a soldier to be the last one to die in Iraq? How do you ask a soldier to be the last one to die for a lie? (Apologies to John Kerry.)

Yes, Bush lied. This much is true, but it is not all. Remember that the war in Iraq was not Bush's to begin with: it was the pet project of a group of Reagan-era notables who refused to shift gears when the Berlin wall came down. The war paint stayed on, the drums still sounded, muffled, perhaps, by a boisterous new economy, but were still there, keeping time as the intrepid Cold Warriors waited for the right moment to take out the big guns again.

We need to ask ourselves if we care enough to stand up and with all our might oppose the policies that have led us over the edge and into a war premised on a lie, signifying nothing.

The truth is the guns never really went away. Bush 1, of course, launched the first war in Iraq before the dust from the wall had a chance to settle. Most of us here at UMass probably still remember bits and pieces of that war as it came across to us on our television screens, mostly flashes of light and the eerie green glow of "night-vision."

That war, too, was not all it seemed to be. And it was built up in much the same way as the latest installment: cast Saddam Hussein as a man of infinite evil, perhaps even evil incarnate; cast ourselves as liberators; move the troops in and lights, camera, action!

Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait, the story goes, so we had no choice but to stop him. No matter that a U.S. official, in a personal meeting with the dictator eight days prior to the invasion, assured him that "we have no opinion on your Arab on Arab conflicts, such as your dispute with Kuwait." No matter that the story about Iraqi soldiers taking babies from their incubators and dashing their bodies to the ground was a bald-faced fiction concocted by the prestigious PR firm of Hill and Knowlton.

The drums did not stop when Clinton came in. It was the Clinton administration that kept a decade of murderous sanctions in place, leaving over half a million Iraqi children dead. And it was Madeline Albright who infamously told Leslie Stahl of "60 Minutes" that "We think the price is worth it." Yes, you heard correctly. New boss, same as the old boss.

Remember the "no-fly zones?" It was the Clinton administration that saw fit to fly bombing runs over Iraq so often that the fact went unreported in all but a few newspapers.

But what good does it do now, really, to discuss any of this? The bottom line is that our soldiers are in Iraq again and we need to do something now to change this fact.

For those who haven't noticed, there is an election coming up. Some say it's the "most important election of our lifetime." Perhaps. But this assumes that elections in this country are even valid anymore.

After 2000, it is amazing that anyone still believes this to be true. Unfortunately, more things need to change in this country than whose face is carved into the battering ram. We need to ask ourselves if we care enough to stand up and with all our might oppose the policies that have led us over the edge and into a war premised on a lie, signifying nothing.

It is perfectly reasonable to want Bush out of office, to say nothing of war crimes charges, impeachment, etc. But it is another thing to think that voting against Bush by voting for a certain John F. Kerry will have any bearing on the direction this country will take, given how little Kerry has done to differentiate himself from the man he presumes to oust.

Not once has Kerry admitted that his vote for military action against Iraq was a mistake. Will he be the one to ask for volunteers to be the last ones to die in Iraq?

The truth about growing up

Peter Foundas

You wake up with a slight headache and a vague recollection of what transpired in the past eight hours. As you sit up from your sheets, you wonder what time it is and whether or not your roommates already went to breakfast. After a pause, the blurry world comes into focus, and you realize that you have to go to the bathroom in the worst way.

You emerge from the bathroom; this is when the fun begins. Assembling with your cohorts from the previous evening's activities, you all try to piece together the past night. Each one of you seems to have your own unique recollection of what happened, but that does not stop you from sharing the mismatched memories, having a few laughs and deciding who gets bragging rights. Perhaps one of you was able to find a suitable hook-up partner, and if so everyone will want to hear the details.

The weekend ends, and the real reasons why you are here begin to unfold. As you enter your new classes for the semester and glance over the syllabus you begin to mentally plot how you can get away with doing the least amount of work and still obtain the grade you want. How much you will actually learn in these classes is up for debate. Will you merely attempt to memorize the bare minimum amount of facts in order to pass the exams, or will you attempt to develop an understanding of the material and do all the assigned readings?

Apathy is the pitfall of every college student. If we succumb to it, our American dream is over.

Some people came to this school with a plan for what they wanted to do when they graduate; hopefully, it is working out for them. However, even those lucky enough to find something to be passionate about may soon realize that the jobs to which they aspire, in reality, do not mirror the idealized images they have created.

The vast majority of us were unsure of ourselves when we came here. Some are still having trouble finding their true passions; others find out too late what their true passions are. After a few years of college it may be too late to switch majors. And, maybe, you have been told there is not much "opportunity" in the field your heading into anyway. So what happens after that?

Indifference starts to set in. Apathy is the pitfall of every college student. If we succumb to it, our American dream is over. We lose the opportunity to actually be what we want to be when we grow up.

Deep down we know what our passions are before we arrive here. There is no way we can suffer through 12 years of education without developing even a slight interest in something, aside from sports or pop culture, because we all cannot be professional athletes or famous celebrities. We'd like to think that we have a perfect understanding of the world around us, but the fact of the matter is most of us have few meaningful experiences with it at all.

What does this mean? That we are doomed to a life of disillusionment and all of us will end up slaving away for the next forty years at a job we hate? No. Think of your college experience as more than just an education, it is the key to happiness, instructing you on how to combine your passions with your work life in the future, this is what we pay our ridiculous tuition for.

It is a series of tests, which you cannot simply cram for to pass. In the coming years we are going to learn what growing up is all about: filing taxes, applying for a mortgage, starting our own careers, starting a family of our own, opening retirement accounts, and caring for aging parents. Maybe some of us got an early start on these things, but very rapidly we will find that growing up is not easy, and it's a much different experience than what we have lived through already. Suddenly, our weekend routines do not seem so important in comparison.

Dar Williams returns to Northampton

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

"Why is it that as we grow older and stronger/ The road signs point us adrift and make us afraid," asks folksy songstress Dar Williams in "You're Aging Well." The track, off her 1993 release "The Honesty Room," seems to have a sentiment that resonates with most college-aged students. Williams seems to have the extraordinary ability to tap into the most basic part of human existence with the simple strum of her guitar. Her voice reflects the fear, optimism and array of emotions people face every day.

In fact a great deal of Williams' work seems to strike a chord with listeners of all ages. Her Web site describes the singer/songwriter's skill as an "insight [that] continues to turn personal experiences into universal experiences to which both dedicated fans and new listeners can relate."

Tonight Williams will bring her insight and folk-inspired sound to the stage of Northampton's Calvin Theater. A former resident of the Pioneer Valley, Dorothy "Dar" Williams has been making music for the better part of 15 years. With seven full-length albums under her belt, including her critically acclaimed fifth studio release "The Beauty of the Rain," Dar has truly come into her own as a musician and songwriter. "Seasons change, but Williams remains both ambitious and pleasingly plain-spoken ... and importantly, she seems more at ease than ever," Rolling Stone said in a recent review of "The Beauty."

The album, featuring guest appearance from the likes of Alison Krauss, Bela Fleck, John Medeski and John Popper represents a more rounded out sound for Williams.

"The songs here are rooted in a migration I made to New York from Massachusetts," said Dar, who lived in Northampton before moving to the City, in regards to her evolving sound. "It can be a little lonely sometimes being a girl with a guitar. I wanted to reach out into the world and see what else was going on."

In addition to her musical endeavors, the multitalented Williams has also branched out into the world of children's literature. As an author Dar's gift with words proves itself ten times over.

"Amalee," Williams' debut novel tells the story of a young girl whose life is thrown into tumult by a tragic turn of events. "She's use to chaos," the singer's website says in a synopsis of the book, "but now her life has become full of uncertainties; school isn't what it used to be, and she has begun questioning her relationship with her friends. However, when Amalee's dad becomes seriously ill, the chaos takes on a new form, and the ways of coping come from some very unexpected places."

For those who are long-time fans as well as those who are simply looking for something to do on a Friday night, now seems to be the best time to catch the rising star in person. Williams can be pretty much guaranteed to put on a show that is both musical sound and thoroughly entertaining.

Dar Williams will play at the Calvin Theater in Northampton tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets range from $32, $27, and $17.50. Dar will also appear at Northampton's Broadside Bookshop on Main Street at 3 p.m. for a signing of "Amalee."

Punk pioneer succumbs in battle with cancer

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Punk rock is dead.

Johnny Ramone, lead guitarist the Ramones, considered by many to be punk music's most influential band, died Wednesday, after a five-year battle with prostate cancer Wednesday.

Ramone, 55, was born John Cummings. He is now the third member of the Ramones to die since 2001. Singer Joey Ramone, born Jeffrey Hyman, died in 2001 of lymphatic cancer and bassist Dee Dee Ramone, born Douglas Colvin, died of a drug overdose, a year later.

Johnny's wife, Linda, and fellow musicians Eddie Vedder of Pearl Jam, Rob Zombie, and John Frusciante of the Red Hot Chili Peppers were at his bedside at the time of his death. Johnny passed in his sleep during the early afternoon at home in Los Angeles.

After attending military academy, Johnny took up the guitar at age 22. He and his friends shared a love for bands like the New York Dolls and the icon Iggy Pop. Their interest in this music would lead Johnny, singer Joey, bassist Dee Dee and drummer Tommy to form the band, the Ramones in 1974. Despite the fact that they had different original last names, they each legally changed them to Ramone.

"Johnny was a true punk, no question about it," said Gary Kurfirst, The Ramones' former manager.

Kurfirst first met the band in 1977 when they were sharing a bill at the Orpheum Theatre in Boston with the band the Talking Heads. Kurfirst got into an argument with the Ramones over using their lights during the Talking Heads set. In the end, Kurfirst won the argument and was allowed to use the lights.

A year later, Johnny personally called Kurfist and said that he had liked his tenacity and would like him to join on as the bands manager. He would be their manager for the next 25 years.

"To understand Johnny, one only had to stand in the parking lot of Lollapalooza and watch the 50 or so tour busses pull up transporting the various artists, wives and families, security, and road crews, and then see out of the corner of your eye an eight-passenger van pull up with these four leather-clad road warriors," Kurfirst said.

"According to the former manager, the band would drive home from shows in Washington DC, Buffalo and Boston so that they would not waste money on a hotel. This odd decision was a request of Johnny's.

"Why spend money on a hotel when I can sleep in my own bed," he once said. It was odd peccadilloes like this that helped to form Johnny's reputation as a not so average rock star.

The Ramones broke onto the music scene in New York in 1976 with their first album, the self-titled, "Ramones." The band soon became famous for coining what was a new sound: simple rock and roll. Their music mainly consisted of the simplicity of four chords, a catchy tune and odd lyrics. All of this with a speedy tempo created a sound that would inspire generations of punk bands.

Johnny was individually known for his political beliefs. Not belitting of the average punk rock star, Ramone was an

Britney's new music video

By Christopher Gazzara
Collegian Correspondent

Britney Spears' image has been tossed and turned in the collective public eye for the past six years. She has been called a princess, a harlot, a queen, a tramp and everything in between. Finally, she has chosen to make a statement on the matter.

Known for keeping mum when it comes to criticism, Britney has apparently had enough. In her new video, a Bobby Brown cover, slated for release on her greatest hits compilation due out in November, Britney finally lights back.

The first clip depicts Britney driving her car recklessly through the Hollywood Hills, a trip culminating in a crash in the pool of a stately mansion. She exits the car, and proceeds to enter the house, ignoring the shocked faces of the crowd around her. She is soaked from head to toe as she enters the mansion and passes a woman who tugs at the ribbon on her dress. The dress falls to the floor and Britney proceeds through the hallway and enters a room where fiance Kevin Federline sits in an armchair. He appears to be viewing projections of Spears on a screen. The image is an interesting one, not unlike Madonna's video, "Take a Bow." Britney is wearing white lingerie, and is moving around on a bed. Here, she lays down her truth, "All these strange relationships really get me down/I see nothing wrong in spreading myself around."

The real-life Britney stands in front of Federline, dances for a moment and leans in for a kiss. From there, waistfall move her into a changing area and she dons a fur coat. She looks at herself in the mirror, while she coos, "Ego trips is not my thing." Clips of the projection reappear, as well as new clips of real-life Britney lying in a bed, wearing a black dress. She gets up and walks back outside where she meets Federline at the door. He takes her hand and they proceed to walk down an aisle, where a black minister stands, smiling at the couple. As Federline slips the ring on her finger, lights flash behind the altar, and a new Britney appears. She is dancing in a club setting, still in plain view of her wedding ceremony.

She brings together two personalities in this montage public Britney, pop godess and private Britney, a girl in love.

With all the bad press surrounding her recent marriage and annulment to childhood friend, Jason Alexander, it is clear that Spears is using this video as an opportunity to clear up some of the speculation about her motives for marrying Federline.

In a recent interview on the new show, the Larry Elder Show, Alexander slammed Spears, stating that she and her family have changed. "Nothing against her, but I wouldn't want to be a part of that family," he said.

Luckily, I don't believe Mr. Alexander has anything to worry about.

Basinger and Evans deliver suprise performance in 'Cellular'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Suspense is a state of being that only exists when we don't know what's going to happen. Hollywood thrillers are meant to exploit that tingly sensation of breathless anticipation, yet all too often they come off as flat and predictable — mechanical exercises that go through Hitchcockian motions.

"Cellular," a technology thriller about cell phones and "Paparazzi," a film that gets off from the boogeyman of tabloid celebrity obsession, are both suspense films in the familiar, comfort-food mode of most generic Hollywood jolt-a-thons, but they keep us on the edge of our seat in newly pleasurable ways.

'Cellular'
Directed by David R. Ellis
Starring Kim Basinger Chris Evans
New Line
86 mins
Grade B

"Cellular" may be the first movie made that's entirely centered around the technological miracle that is the cell phone. It's based on a story by the cult filmmaker Larry Cohen (the script is actually by Chris Morgan) who last made the last electronic communications thriller, "Phone Booth." That movie pinned Colin Farrell in, yes, a phone booth for 81 minutes, as he parried back and forth with the purring, velvet-voiced sniper on the other end of the line.

In "Cellular" the poor schmuck stuck on the line is Ryan (Chris Evans), a callow beach bum in his twenties that answers his shiny new cellular (it even has a video camera attached) only to be confronted by the frantic pleas of Jessica Martin (Kim Basinger), an Los Angeles based science teacher who has been kidnapped by a band of armed thugs.

Most of "Cellular" consists of Ryan rushing around Los Angeles, stealing cars and brandishing guns. The fun of the movie comes from watching Ryan get in touch with his inner action hero. Events force him into helping out Jessica – she's on a dilapidated phone, and she may not get another chance if the line cuts out. We see Ryan squeezed into a situation straight out of Hitchcock: the innocent man caught in a web of suspense.

Too much of "Cellular" is made from out-of-the-bucket parts; dirty cops, incriminating videotapes, the creeping walk through dark and enclosed spaces. The movie's director is David R. Ellis, who previously directed the giddy and gore-drenched "Final Destination 2." If anything, he knows how to direct a thriller in a way that it zooms along happily on its own formula wavelength (he can also stage a mean highway demolition derby).

The acting in "Cellular" is surprisingly top-notch, from the bruised strength of Basinger to the boyish likeability of Evans to William H. Macy, who is given a rare heroic part.

"Cellular" never actually comes together as a movie, but it does have enough clever parts to keep you entertained.

'Paparazzi'
Directed by Paul Abascal
Starring Cole Hauser Tom Sizemore
Fox
93 mins
Grade C

The time is about right to make a drama about the tawdry ghost of celebrity mania. "Paparazzi," is not that movie. We live in a time when we want to know everything about our Hollywood royalty. It would be nice to see a movie that addressed the double-edged sword of celeb worship, to see how the paparazzi that staulk and skewer their prey with a telescopic lens may be scum, but we, the worshippers, are just as complicit. "Paparazzi," however, is a lurid, death-wish revenge fantasy. It's a movie in which we're supposed to cheer at the destruction of life at hand.

Cole Hauser, with his model's face and honeyed-gravel voice, plays Bo Laramie, a Midwestern nobody who becomes a Hollywood somebody when he stars in a schlock action flick titled "Adrenaline Force." We never get to see that movie (I'm not sure I wanted to) but, we get to hear a lot of names dropped and see a lot of celebrity cameos (Vince Vaughn, Chris Rock, Matthew McConaughey) as if the director wanted the movie to be an inside-the-industry satire wrapped in the body of a suspense film.

Unfortunately though, "Paparazzi" never makes sense. The movie leapfrogs through plot hole after plot hole as if that is how to keep us on the edge of our seat, but that just makes the film look even dumber and worse, cartoonish. It exists outside the realm of suspendable disbelief.

Laramie has been stalked by a quartet of scummy camera hounds, led by particularly sleazy photographer Rex Harper (Tom Sizemore.) Boxing him in on the street one night, they cause him to crash, injuring his wife and child. Soon the paparazzi begin dying off one by one, and the detective investigating (Dennis Farina) suspects that Laramie might be involved.

There's some funky inventiveness in the way that Laramie, his face frozen into a mask of stoic vengeance, picks off the paparazzo. Yet the movie is so unbalanced that it topples into oblivion. The movie doesn't just make the shutterbugs into slimy careerists; it has to give them extra-dirty back-stories (attempted rape and assault weapon possession charges just to name a couple) so that we hiss at them even more.

Laramie, meanwhile, is hardly given a personality. His character is written and acted in a way that progressively makes him appear less like a movie star and more like your friendly neighborhood carpenter. His rage is even less convincing in its brutality. It seems to have been contrived and laid upon him by the screenplay. "Paparazzi" wants you to root for Laramie to demolish these camera-touting thugs, but the film is so flat that you hardly care who gets whom. The movie, for all its trickery, just evaporates into thin air.

William H. Macy recently co-starred in David R. Ellis' new thriller "Cellular."

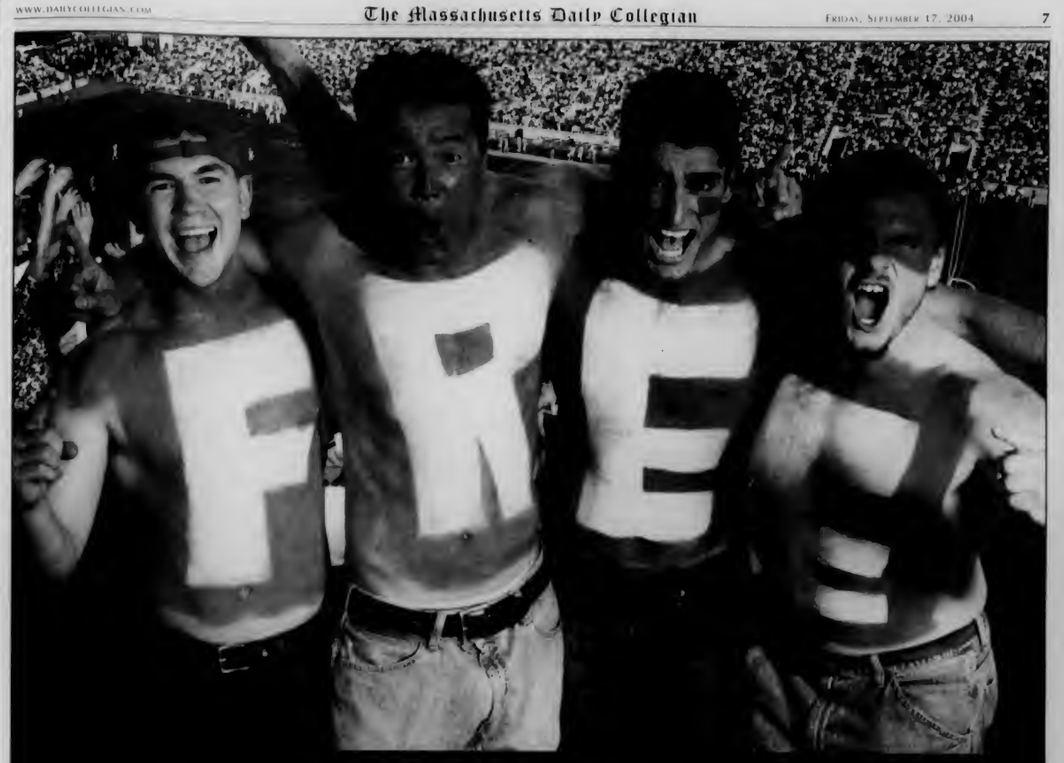
advocate for the Republican Party and was a staunch supporter of the recently deceased President Ronald Reagan.



Just before Johnny Ramone's death, on Sunday, September 12, bands like the Red Hot Chili Peppers, Pearl Jam, and even crazed rocker Henry Rollins performed in a Ramones tribute concert in Hollywood to benefit the Lymphoma Research Foundation and the Cedars-Sinai Prostate Cancer Research Center.

Also, A documentary entitled "End of the Century: The Story of The Ramones," was released in theaters recently. The documentary is a complete and in depth biography of the band that spans their entire career before they called it quits for good in 1996. The band was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2002.

Johnny was cremated in a private ceremony on Thursday. There will also be an unveiling of a statue of Johnny Ramone at Hollywood Forever Cemetery next month.

going to get our entertainment?

College hockey prohibits fighting, and minor league hockey is simply that, amateurs that punch like pansies. Where are we going to find a good fight on TV that won't charge us $60 just to see De La Hoya go down quicker than a pint of your favorite drink?

The answer: celebrity boxing. Rupert Murdoch, if you have any brains left in you, you will sign Gary Coleman to a 12-fight deal before it's too late!

For the rest of you Americans that lost interest in hockey five years ago, it's time to find a new sport to cling to, and yours truly has a suggestion: why not give that other Canadian pastime a try?

You know, that other game the Native Americans invented hundreds of years ago.

I'm talking about lacrosse. It's the perfect combination of stick swinging and body-checking all wrapped up into one. And it's a growing sport, too. Just ask the 46,000 that showed up for last year's NCAA Final Four.

Best of all, you can play it anywhere, not just inside a frigid rink.

NHL players forced to search for work

By Rob Gloster
Associated Press

NHL players began scattering across the globe Thursday in search of work on Day 1 of the lockout, with no negotiations scheduled between union and management.

While rinks from Pittsburgh to Montreal to Anaheim figure to be quiet in the coming weeks, the ice will be crowded with high-priced talent in places such as the Czech Republic.

Jaromir Jagr skated for the first time with the Czech team Rabat Kladno, wearing the blue and white colors of the club that nurtured him before he arrived in the NHL in 1990. His father is the club president.

"He should start playing as soon as he is healthy, hopefully next week," said Ota Cerny, the team's general manager, referring to the hip injury that bothered Jagr during the World Cup of Hockey.

Jagr, who would have been working out with his New York Rangers teammates if not for the lockout, also returned to the Czech Republic during the 1994 NHL lockout. He scored eight goals in 11 games for Kladno.

Pavel Barta, a Czech league official, said about 30 of the 73 Czech-born NHL players will come home to play in local leagues during the lockout – which both NHL owners and players say could wipe out this entire season. Among them is Milan Hejduk of the Colorado Avalanche, who is expected to join HC Moeller Pardubice.

"This is a great bonus that makes the local league much more attractive," Barta said. "The fans will finally see the big names they otherwise see only on television."

In North America, the predominant sound Thursday at NHL practice arenas was silence. In Columbus, Ohio, the speakers outside the Blue Jackets' arena were quiet instead of blaring franchise highlights.

Some players held informal workouts, while others were busy looking for work – either overseas, or in the revived World Hockey Association that plans to open Oct. 29 or in a six-team circuit called the Original Stars Hockey League that will feature four-on-four play.

Others are expected to appear in the AHL, where the season begins Oct. 13. Three Ottawa Senators regulars will play for a farm team in Binghamton, N.Y., and Ottawa goalie Dominik Hasek is expected to at least work out with the minor league team for two weeks.

The league is seeking massive economic change, and NHL commissioner Gary Bettman has said the confrontation possibly could extend to the 2005-06 season and jeopardize the NHL's place in the 2006 Winter Olympics.

He said the teams combined to lose more than $1.8 billion over 10 years, adding management will not agree to a deal that doesn't include a defined relationship between revenue and salaries. Union head Bob Goodenow said players are "not prepared to entertain a salary cap in any way, shape, measure or form."

The 30 teams – 24 in the United States, six in Canada – had been set to start opening training camps Thursday, the day after the expiration of the current labor contract.

The deal was first agreed to in 1995 and extended two years later through Sept. 15, 2004. Bettman termed the extension "a mistake, in hindsight."

While players and owners defended their positions Thursday, one player reflected on what could be his second lost season in recent years.

Several Sabres players and New York Islanders captain Michael Peca gathered at a rink in suburban Buffalo for an informal workout. Peca missed the entire 2000-01 season because of a contract dispute with the Sabres and eventually was traded in June 2001 to the Islanders.

"Speaking from experience, sitting out a season is not the easiest thing to do," he said. "But (now) you have 700-plus guys on your side, and not just you standing alone. Obviously, the principles are very strong and we'll stick by them."

The stoppage is the first for a North American major league since the 1998-99 NBA lockout.

UM to battle Rams

The junior duo leads the offensive attack for the Rams. Melanie, coming off a season in which she was named the A-10 Offensive Player of the Year, is third on the team in scoring. Megan, a preseason first-team All-Conference selection, is leading the team in points.

The task of containing this twosome will be even more difficult for the Minutewomen if sophomore defender Stephanie Barrett doesn't suit up. Barrett injured her knee in Sunday's game at New Hampshire and, as of Wednesday, Rudy was still unsure if she would be able to play. Barrett turned in her best effort of the season before being injured, shutting down one of the Wildcats' leading scorers.

Despite the prospect of competing against one of the better teams in the A-10 shorthanded, Rudy remains optimistic about his team.

"I think we're about 18 inches away from being 3-1," Rudy said, citing the number of shots that have hit the posts for UMass and the number of passes that have just missed setting up goals.

"We've made a lot of errors that are youth-related, but they're trying hard," Rudy said. "We've been close, and it's frustrating because it's agonizingly close."

This UMass team is very young, as six freshmen have seen extensive playing time already, and Rudy understands that there will be some growing pains.

"I didn't expect to be 0-4," Rudy said. "But I think that reality has set in. We're young, and we're going to make young errors."

And while Rudy is still waiting for his returning players to raise their level of play, he is encouraged that the team has not gotten into any finger-pointing and that the players are continuing to work hard.

One win this early in a long season typically isn't a huge feat, but for the young UMass team, a win Friday night against a top conference opponent could be just what is needed to turn the season around.

Patriots well-rested for Cards

By Bob Baum
Associated Press

TEMPE, Ariz. (AP) – Not that they need it, but the New England Patriots have more going for them than superior talent this weekend against Arizona.

They have three extra days to prepare after opening with a Thursday night victory at home over Indianapolis. And they have a bye to rest up after a sweaty weekend in the desert.

"That really just assured me the sense of humor the NFL has in their schedule," Arizona coach Dennis Green said.

Even the weather gods are smiling on New England. Weeks of triple-digit heat are expected to give way to a cooling trend, with the high forecast in the low to mid 90s for Sunday.

"We need it to be about 110," the Cardinals' Emmitt Smith said.

The Patriots came to Phoenix on Thursday for some extra time to prepare for what still will be warm conditions. The defending Super Bowl champions leave little to chance. That's one reason they have won 16 games in a row, two shy of the NFL record.

"They've got great players all the way around," Smith said. "Great corners, great linebackers, great defensive linemen, a great head coach, great offense, great wide receivers, great schemes, super fans I guess. What else can I say? They're superb."

Coach Bill Belichick, though, will have none of the talk of winning streaks or Super Bowl triumphs.

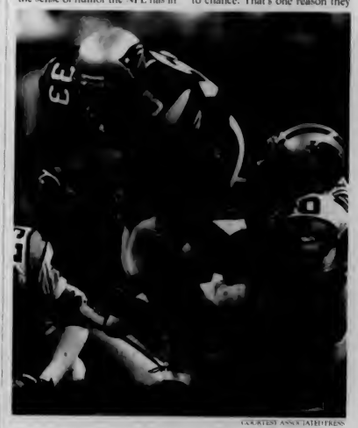
"There's no championship team. There's been one game played this year, and that's it," he said. "And so nobody's won anything. Nobody's done anything. Everybody's got a long, long way to go and a lot of football left to play."

The Cardinals will be playing their home opener under new coach Dennis Green, and are coming off a competitive, but losing, effort at St. Louis, where they were beaten 17-10 after leading 10-9 early in the fourth quarter.

Green appears to be making progress in changing the attitude of players in the perpetually losing Arizona franchise. Just listen to rookie defensive tackle Darnell Dockett talk about the Patriots.

"I'm a professional player. This is what I get paid to do," he said. "I'm not overwhelmed by all their Super Bowls and all that. I just want to go out there and play, and find out if they're really that good."

Rushing defense was a sore spot for New England in its opener, with Edgerrin James gaining 142 yards for the Colts in a 27-24 Patriots' victory that wasn't assured until Indianapolis' Mike Vanderjagt missed a 48-yard field goal with 24 seconds to play.



Only Clinton Portis gained more than 100 yards against New England last season.

"If it gets better, maybe it will be an aberration," the Patriots' coach said. "If it doesn't, then we'll say that's a huge problem. We won't know until Sunday where it is."

Green, 3-0 lifetime against Belichick-coached teams, believes there's an obvious reason for the run defense problems.

"They miss Ted Washington," Green said of the big nose tackle who signed with Oakland. "In a league of big players, then there are giant players. Ted Washington is about as big as they get."

Smith, the NFL's career rushing leader, gained 87 yards in 16 carries, including an 11-yard touchdown, against the Rams, his best game since coming to Arizona.

UMass Classic on tap

Minutemen to play Siena and Harvard

By Bob McGovern
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a thrilling 3-2 double overtime victory over Hartford on Wednesday, the Massachusetts men's soccer team (1-3-0, 0-0-0 A-10) is looking to take two this weekend at the UMass Classic.

The Minutemen will take on Siena (0-3-1) and Harvard (1-3-0) on Saturday and Sunday, respectively. This will be the 11th annual UMass Classic, where the Minutemen are 10-4-2.

UMass coach Sam Koch is excited for the event, but is more concerned with his team continuing to improve.

"It's nice to be at home, I wouldn't say it's big, it's an opportunity to play and work on the things we need to work on," Koch said. "Slowly but surely we need to tighten up in the back and create a little bit more on offense."

Koch is looking to advance upon the successes his team achieved in its game against Hartford. In the first half it was pure domination by the Minutemen, but a couple of miscues in the second half turned what looked like a sure thing into a nail biter for UMass.

"We've got to make it more difficult for the other team to get scoring opportunities and we have to stay more compact and identify our defensive assignments better than we have," Koch said.

One major move on defense was the switching of junior captain Craig Canavan to sweeper from center-back midfield. Canavan played most of last year's campaign at sweeper, and feels he is more comfortable on defense.

"I feel a lot more comfortable back there. I can see the field better," Canavan said after Wednesday's game. "To credit Tim Kitchell he tackles a little harder than I do, so I think the positions for each of us are a better fit."

Kitchell was moved up to center midfield where he will join Ian O'Donnell as an aggressive duo on defense. Canavan will be their vocal leader and attempt to organize a defense that has yet to reach its untapped potential.

Over it's first three games the Minutemen gave up a total of nine goals, while only scoring two. Going into this season there was little doubt that the UMass defense would hold its own. Now with this slight alteration, Koch is hoping his defense is finally where it should be.

"They've all played for a long time, so I think they understand the concept, it's now making sure that they're working together as a unit," Koch said. "They need to communicate with each other and how they stay disciplined with their assignments will determine how we play."

Siena is winless on the season, but is coming off a respectable performance against Binghampton, who was ranked No. 22 in the nation. In their three previous contests the Saints were shutout by their opponents, but thanks to a goal and assist by Alejandro Vazquez, Siena was able to break out of its drought.

Harvard has had its share of troubles this year, but won its first game on Sunday against Siena 1-0. The Crimson has given up a total of six goals in three games thus far, and is looking to turnaround its early-season defensive struggles.

Atlantic 10 champion Rhode Island, defeated Harvard in its first game of the season 3-1, so the Crimson is no strangers to some of the top talent in the Minutemen's conference.

Leading the way for Harvard has been Charles Altcheck and Matt Hall. Altcheck has two goals on the season for the Crimson, while Hall has been quite busy on offense with a team-leading 11 shots.

MATTHEW REED/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Nick Billman has split time with senior captain Colin Burns in net for the Maroon and White this season.

What to do without the NHL

The inevitable is now official. What was once merely word of mouth on the street has now made its way to the front page. There will be no hockey for quite some time.

So what is a guy or girl like you and I supposed to do to keep entertained while we wait for these stingy owners, bone-headed players and apathetic powers-that-be in the front office to cease clashing and finally adopt a salary cap? Yours' truly has a few suggestions.

Brendan Hall

For starters, I am creating my own rotisserie hockey league. I haven't decided what to name my league yet, but I've got some good ones.

I don't know, does anyone think "The Washed-up, Unemployed, Mullet-haired Hockey Bums League" would be pushing it? I think I'm going to stick with my team's name though—"Greed, Inc." After all, the latest box score off the press is "Greed 1, NHL 0."

But since goals, assists and saves are going to be rendered useless for the next year and a half, I've decided to count things like ignorant statements said in interviews, court appearances, DUI's, Russian supermodels hooked up with, and phrases said that sound wicked hilarious with that weird accent (about time for another Molson, eeh?).

Bonus points will be awarded to players with funny last names. Right now my team consists of Jeremy Roenick, Theo Fleury, Miroslav Satan, Radek Bonk and Mr. 44 himself, Todd Bertuzzi. Think you can beat me?

And for all you Chicago Blackhawks fans, you can stop hucking rocks at Bill Wirtz's house — for now. He's still the worst owner in sports, and his behavior is inexcusable for such a historic franchise, but the player's are the real reason this deal didn't work out and they are out on the street and unemployed.

Do yourselves a favor and pay a visit to your least favorite player and tell them, "My grandmother can hold a job longer than you ... and she can't read!"

For us few, lonely Bruins fans, that's just one less tragedy for us to worry about. By now, we're all sick and tired of the Black and Gold making a great late-season run in which they are practically invincible (or just backing their way in, depending on if it's an even or odd year), only to see them get their butts handed to them on a silver platter.

But that's just the tip of the iceberg. Let's not forget Brady and Schilling were on back-to-back covers of Sports Illustrated, and that other not-so-insignificant guy they used to call "The Glove" would rather quit. I can't sleep at night anymore ... thanks a lot, ESPN.

Don't worry, there's still hope from the revenue perspective. Remember that movie "Field of Dreams?" You know, when the voices in Kevin Costner's head tell him to destroy his farm and build a baseball field, and then all his imaginary friends start playing baseball with him?

I think you get the idea. If you open the doors, fans will still come to the arena to drink beer and cuss at each other from respectable distances. Unless you're in Philadelphia, then a brawl will ensue.

Which brings me to fighting: the one thing that even the casual fan will miss during the lockout. With no hockey fights, where are we

Still in search of first victory, Minutewomen to host Maine

By Joshua Pollock
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts field hockey team (0-6) will be looking for its first win of the season as they face Maine (5-2) on Sunday at Garber Field at 2 p.m.

The Maroon and White will look to continue its dominance against the Black Bears, as Maine has never beaten UMass. This will be the first time that these two teams have met in ten years. UMass leads the all-time series 12-0-1.

Maine is currently second in the standings in the America East and is rolling after three consecutive wins against Fairfield, Temple and Dartmouth.

Head coach Patty Shea will be looking for her players to give a performance similar to how they played against Boston University.

"We definitely need to carry over our intensity, fight, emotion and communication," Shea said. "We collectively played the game very strong."

The Minutewomen endured a heartbreaking 1-0 loss at home against BU on Wednesday but played what Shea considered some of their best field hockey of the young season.

"Our defense is doing an incredible job," Shea said. "We haven't been scored against on a penalty corner yet. Right now our biggest weakness is finishing. We need to put the ball in the cage."

Although they made a significant improvement from the Terrapin Invitational, UMass has just two goals in six games this season, and will be looking to avoid its fourth shutout in a row.

Junior goalkeeper Jamie Morin will defend the cage for the Black Bears on Sunday. She currently ranks second in the America East Conference with two shutouts in six games. She also ranks second in goals against average (1.48).

"Goalkeeping is a very strong point for Maine," Shea said. "[Maine coach] Terry Kix is a former goalkeeper, and you can see her strong influence at that position."

After making a tremendous effort in the loss at BU, the team is feeling a little frustration. Shea feels this can be an advantage.

"We need to channel our frustration, and turn it into a positive spin in practice," she said. Perhaps Thursday's day off will also work in favor for the struggling Minutewomen, who haven't scored a goal since September 5 against Harvard. Maine plays Harvard on Saturday before traveling to Amherst for Sunday's game.

In order to win, the Maroon and White will need to have to come up with more scoring opportunities. UMass currently ranks last in the Atlantic-10 averaging a mere six shots per game with a 0.40 goals per game average. In comparison, Atlantic 10 Conference leading Richmond is averaging 24 shots per game, with an average of 5 goals per game.

While they have gotten off to a slow start to the season, Coach Shea remains positive. "It's about where we're going, not what has happened," she said. "We took some critical steps against BU, and we want to carry them over to this game against Maine."

UM will travel to face A-10 rival Rhode Island

By Dan Duggan
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Streaks are a major part of sports. One only needs to look at the recent surge of the Boston Red Sox to see that a prolonged winning streak can change the entire complexion of a season.

The flip side of this coin is dealing with an extended losing streak. This is the challenge facing the Massachusetts women's soccer team: to end its four-game losing skid.

Whereas everything seems to be going the Sox way for the past month, the Minutewomen haven't been able to catch a break. From shots hitting crossbars and posts to a host of injuries and downright inconsistent play, UMass has been unable to register a victory this season.

"We haven't really gotten our measure of luck," coach Jim Rudy said. "But you make some of your luck. The team is pushing hard, and we've been in every game."

The Minutewomen get a chance to break into the win column this Friday night when they travel to the University of Rhode Island to take on the Rams.

URI (2-4, 0-0 Atlantic-10) has played some of the best competition in the country to begin the season, and is expected to be one of the top teams in the A-10 this year.

Rudy sees the game against Rhode Island as an opportunity for the team to turn around the season.

"In a way, the Rhode Island game becomes a new season for us," Rudy said. "You can forget what our record is because in conference we're 0-0."

While Rudy would like nothing more than to leave Rhode Island with a win, UMass will have a tough challenge.

The Maroon and White will have its hands full trying to contain the explosive Kasparek twins.

$40K raised in "Light the Night"

By Mike Di Natale and Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Friends and family of Casey Kane, a former Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editor in Chief and University of Massachusetts student, were among the participants who walked in the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society's 6th annual "Light the Night Walk" at Look Memorial Park in Northampton last night to raise money for the victims of blood cancers like lymphoma, which Kane died of on May 16, 2004.

Hope shined as bright as the crowd's lighted balloons – survivors carrying red, and supporters holding white. The crowd seemed compelled to be there — whether it was the memories of lost loved ones or the arousing sense of camaraderie from fellow walkers. But mostly, the people gathered in hope that their efforts will lead to a cure for the numerous types of blood cancer that effect so many each year. "It was a nice event. I'll definitely do it again. Casey and I were supposed to do it last year, but she wasn't up to it," said Matt Vautour, Casey's friend.

"I want to help find a cure, so that other families don't have to suffer," said Elaine Patrick Smith, 60, who was inspired to participate in this year's walk after her uncle passed away two years ago after a bout with cancer, "It's a good cause."

Caroline Menir, 54, walking for the 4th consecutive year, expressed her desire to help the society, "My cousin's mother passed away because of lymphoma and I heard about this through the grape vine."

This year's two-mile walk, which took participants in a loop around Look Memorial Park, should raise "as much as $40,000 for the society," according to the event's coordinator, Kim McDonough.

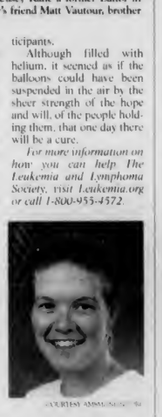
The money will be used to raise awareness and fight for a cure for blood cancers like leukemia, lymphoma, Hodgkin's disease and myeloma. With these goals in mind, the charity group has become one of the top rated groups of its kind; using 75 percent of their expenditures to directly aid their cause.

The day's activities began shortly after 4:00 p.m., when people began to trickle into the area out the walk's starting point. Taking advantage of the beautiful afternoon, families were taking time for picnic lunches and barbequing, as well as making room to toss around a few baseballs and footballs. The Society provided a DJ to entertain people as they waited for the walk to begin, keeping the mood festive by playing a wide selection of classic oldies.

For the kids, there was face painting, and balloon animals.

As the sun began to set, event leaders took the microphone away from the DJ, and began to thank participants and sponsors for being there, remind the crowd that "everyone can make a difference."

At 6:30 p.m. precisely, the walk began. The participants balloons lit up the night with their flashing lights, shining bright to symbolize the hope of those carrying them. Over 500 walkers participated, varied in age from young to old. One child walked with the aid of crutches, while others whom were unable to walk were pushed in wheelchairs by their fellow participants.



Although filled with helium, it seemed as if the balloons could have been suspended in the air by the sheer strength of the hope and will, of the people holding them, that one day there will be a cure.

IPO estimates '04-'05 budget deficit

By Jeremy Dirac
Collegian Correspondent

According to a news release Wednesday, the University of Massachusetts projected a $675,000 deficit for the International Program Office this year. It attributes the shortfall to state budget cuts and the outcome of recent arbitration over the controversial international student fee.

"That fee would have provided approximately $180,000 in annual revenue" according to a UMass news release.

The release also said the budget shortfall will be addressed by using money from financial reserves, closing some study abroad programs, increasing fees, and "more vigorous recruitment for study abroad."

Increases in visa fees for foreign students and user fees for domestic students reduced this year's $675,000 deficit projection down to $375,000 according to the news release. It also said that "bridge funds" would cover $315,000. Another $60,000 is to be generated by increasing the application fee for international graduate students from $50 to $65. However, domestic students will still pay $40.

The director of the IPO, Frank Hugus said that the "bridge funds" come from two sources — the IPO's financial reserve and bridge money, whose amount is negotiated with the Provost's office. Hugus said that the increase in the international students' application fee puts UMass in line with other schools.

"Virtually every other university in the country charges a similar fee," said Hugus.

The IPO developed the international student fee to pay for the cut in its funding and to pay for the newly mandated Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), required under the Patriot Act. The system is an electronic record keeping system for international students. About $10 of the $65 fee went towards paying for SEVIS.

The Graduate Employee Organization told The Republican newspaper in August. SEVIS, which is still running, was one of the primary reasons many international students were upset about the fee increases.

"We believe that asking international students to pay for their own surveillance is not only discriminatory, but a blow in the face of the hard-working individuals from foreign countries that contribute to the academic excellence at UMass" reads the GEO website.

International students were also upset because they felt that the fee discriminated against them and ought to be applied throughout the student body. Many of those affected claimed that graduate students cannot take out loans, are limited in the hours that they can work, and faced increases in tuition and housing just before the fee went into place last semester.

Following a long battle between the GEO and others against the administration, the international student fee was repealed.

"It was definitely worth the efforts. We overturned this fee through arbitration, but that was only because of all the efforts we put in elsewhere," said GEO Labor Educator, Craig Sinclair.

Those opposed to the fee made petitions one with about 1000 signatures. Others performed protest rallies the largest was on February 19, when about 250 students marched through Whitmore chanting "This racist policy's got to go." About 20 students from that rally engaged in a hunger strike, while about 200-250 students refused to pay the student fee, risking expulsion and possible deportation.

Sinclair said that the administration has been willing to change the facts, first making SEVIS appear to be the main reason for the international student fee and then downplaying it's role.

"Because they're the establishment, we have to constantly prove that they're fudging the facts" said Sinclair.

Provost Charlena Seymour was unavailable for comment at press time.

Students register at "01003 Votes"

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Despite poor weather, University of Massachusetts students trenched though heavy downpours to the Student Union Ballroom Saturday to register to vote and enjoy the festivities at the campaign for "01003 Votes!"

Several student groups, volunteers and politicians gathered to support the youth vote and to encourage the college-aged to make a difference in not only this year's presidential election but also elections on the campus, town and state level.

The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, a registered student organization on campus was there to inform students about the importance of voting in all elections, both national and local.

"I got involved with SCERA because I want to see more students getting involved," sophomore Deirdra Felley said, "if we all lived up to our potential, we would make a humongous difference."

According to Felley, UMass would be the largest absentee voting block in the state.

Brian Roberts, a junior, engineering major volunteers for SCERA because he feels that if the youth voters understand the election process, more people would get involved in elections.

"Personally, I am here because I think the students really need to make a change, the apathy of voting now is not good. Being involved and making change on so many issues is important," Roberts said. "If we're not voting or registering to vote, then we can't make any change and we can't do that when we don't have a voting constituency."

SCERA volunteers say that students are interested in voting but choose not to because they are nervous, not informed or are unaware of the actual election process. They handed out pamphlets containing the names, key issues and websites for all of the candidates.

"It does not matter who you are voting for," Roberts said, "it mat-

Goodman speaks in Noho

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — It was standing room only at the Unitarian Society of Northampton and Florence on Saturday night for a presentation by Amy Goodman, host of the activist news program Democracy Now!

The presentation was part of a promotion of her new book, "The Exception to the Rulers," which was sponsored by United for a Fair Economy and Grassroots International. Goodman's visit to Northampton is part of a one hundred-city tour.

Eric Bachrach, who is the director of the Community Musical School of Springfield, said he came to hear Amy because of her, "just analysis" of the world's events.

"It's impossible to get information and truth from the standard commercial media, public radio, and public television," Bachrach said. "It's a one-sided biased interpretation with a military agenda."

Kevin Murray, a graduate student of the University of Massachusetts, is the Executive Director of Grassroots International, an organization that raises money from people in the U.S. to give to needy organizations around the globe. Murray spoke briefly about international injustice and the need for every person to do their part to improve our world.

Murray gave one example that happened last year to Disney CEO Michael Eisner. Apparently, Eisner made 115,000 times more than the

Bush up in polls, denies mobilizing

By Gabriel Dye
Collegian Staff

The poll gap has widened, and the insults are hot.

Current national public opinion polls released at the end of last week vary. Some show President Bush's emerging as a 13 point leader, while others reflect a statistical dead heat between the President and the Democratic nominee John Kerry.

The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press showed the two candidates neck and neck at 46 percent each among likely voters. According to the Gallup poll however, President Bush leads the race among likely voters with 55 percent to Kerry's 42 percent. A sizeable gap of 8 percent still remained between the candidates in the New York Times/CBS poll, with Bush's 51 percent to Kerry's 42 percent.

The polls are subject to change.

Bush's Texas Air National Guard service has taken a spotlight. Bush, addressing National Guard members, said he was proud of his service. In a potentially harmful contrast, documents recently released by CBS indicate that Bush received preferential treatment and refused to take a drug test during his service. The documents however, are of questionable authenticity.

Meanwhile, Kerry and Bush have continued to plug along the campaign trail.

With six weeks until the Nov. 2nd election, Kerry has sharpened his attacks on the Bush administration. Kerry charged Bush with having secret plans to mobilize Army Reserve and National Guard units following the election. "Hide it from the people, then make the move," said Kerry on Friday. A Pentagon spokesman has denied the accusation.

The infamous Swift Boat Veterans for Truth have resurfaced and are running a new attack on Kerry's credibility, citing his post-Vietnam actions. At the same time, the Bush campaign has filed a federal lawsuit in an attempt to force the Federal Election Commission to embrace restrictive regulations on independent advocacy groups.

The debate over Iraq remains the dominant theme of the election. Bush has latched onto a speech discrediting Kerry as a possible commander-in-chief.

"The problem is, just last summer [Kerry] had a completely different view (on the cost of our operations in Iraq)," Bush said Tuesday.

Kerry quickly responded with charges that Bush "glosses over Iraq as if everything is fine."

Kerry and Bush continue to campaign, mainly in key battleground states.

average Haitian worker who sewed Disney insignia. Murray said that such inequality must be eradicated.

The Executive Director for United for a Fair Economy, Meizhu Lui said, "We're here because we feel that the biggest problem in the U.S. today is a growing inequality, poverty is growing at the bottom and the middle class is shrinking." This daughter of Chinese immigrants, said, "We have King George who wants to build an empire... of the corporations, by the corporations, and for the corporations."

A documentary titled "Exception to the Rulers," was shown where Goodman narrates her interpretation of the current condition of the media. It brought up the point that there is a real discussion in the national media as to whether or not torture is an acceptable means to obtain information. The film also described glaring disparities between the war coverage by CNN and CNN International. CNN International, as well as other non-American news outlets routinely shows the pictures of the casualties in Iraq, while CNN and other American channels do not disclose these pictures.

In the film, Amy says that there is an "explosion, or concentration of ownership," in the media. It uses Clear Channel — a company that now owns over 1400 radio stations — as an example. According to the film, Clear Channel, which a Bush-connected company, sponsors pro-war rallies and does not allow anti-war music on its airwaves. The film also reports that MTV will not play any video that uses the word war.

The documentary detailed a news phenomenon in which networks are paying retired military generals to assist with war coverage. The film asks the question, "Why don't they have peace activists on the payroll?"

In regards to the film, Goodman said, "This is journalism in America today."

In the time leading up to the occupation of Iraq, out of 393 pre-war interviews; CBS, NBC, ABC, and PBS combined only aired three anti-war voices, according to the film.

The film, which came out in April, was co-authored by Goodman's brother, David. He spoke after the film was shown.

"You can choose fiction or non-fiction," David Goodman said among a few chuckles and claps, which were not uncommon throughout the night. He referred to the media as "stenographers, megaphones for the government."

David Goodman addressed the issue of civil rights, which he feels have been eroded. He used several excerpts from the book to illustrate his point. One such story involved a man from South Carolina who was arrested for holding a, 'No war for oil,' sign.

The man was allegedly told to protest in a 'free speech zone.' He claims he responded by saying that he thought the whole country was a free speech zone. The man was subsequently arrested and charged with threatening the President's safety.

Mr. Goodman also cited the Democratic National Convention in Boston, where protestors were relegated to 'free speech' cages away from the convention site.

Before she had even uttered a word, Goodman was given a sustained standing ovation. She began by saying, "We have to challenge the corporate media and shore up independent media, it is a matter of life and death."

Goodman said the national corporate media has not interviewed her or her brother about the book, which is currently at number seventeen on the New York Times bestseller list. Amy told the story that at the beginning of the bombing campaign in Iraq, Dan Rather was interviewed by the BBC, a British broadcast news network, and he said that he can't ask the hard questions or he'll be neck laced.

Goodman mentioned the recent apology by the New York Times for their substandard coverage on Iraq. She said the apology is not enough. Goodman believes that their "lies" cost lives. She said that people believed that there were 'weapons of mass destruction' because the Times told them so.

"The people are not stupid, they just read these lies," she said.

Goodman also believes that there was a "re-writing of history" by the media following President Reagan's death.

She said that she is concerned that people will not leave their homes to vote in November. Goodman said that in 2000 most people in the U.S. did not go to the polls. "The only thing that's going to save this country is dissent,"she said.

Jay Deacon, the minister of the Unitarian Society said that he is a daily listener of Democracy Now! The hourly news program airs daily from 8 a.m. to 9 a.m. on 91.1 WMUA FM; it is broadcast on more than two hundred and seventy-five radio stations nationwide. Minister Deacon said that he does discuss current political issues with his congregation.

"Where the Bush administration has taken this county is disastrous and dangerous," said Deacon.

"We want to get the people addicted to truth," said Northampton resident Frances Crowe, who wore an 'I love the people of Iraq,' button over her Democracy Now t-shirt. Crowe spent four years advocating bringing Goodman's Democracy Now! program to WMUA.

"She's what a real journalist should be," said UMass Communications professor Sut Jhally.

Jhally went on to say that Democracy Now! is, "the only place where you can get real news."

Jhally recently finished a film called "Hijacking Catastrophe," which looks at how the Bush administration used 9/11 to sell a predetermined agenda for the invasion of Iraq. The film is already in theatres in San Francisco and New York. Jhally urges students to wake up at eight o'clock each morning to listen to Democracy Now! and said it will make students feel better because they will begin the day properly informed.

SCERA gets voters

ters that you are voting."

SCERA is also running a campaign dubbed "Dorm Storm" where volunteers go into the campus dormitories knocking on doors asking people to register to vote or to educate them about the issues.

Michael DiNatal, a senior journalism major, re-registered to vote yesterday as a UMass Amherst resident.

"We live in a free democratic society and in order to live in that society, you have to vote.

DiNatal, who is voting for David Cobb of the Green Party this November, said that it is more important that the youth population votes rather than the candidate they are voting for.

Students from one of the newest Registered Student Organization additions "Voices of Planned Parenthood" were there to support youth voting and to educate students about abortions rights, sexuality and emergency contraception.

"We want to encourage people to vote in general but Kerry is pro-choice and that is important," said Jessica Parker, a sophomore BDIC major.

Their table was decorated with information about STD's, condoms and t-shirts. It also included posters with the slogan, "Politics is like sex, protect yourself – vote," a motto that actress Drew Barrymore has been known to wear on a t-shirt.

Other groups that represented youth voting and education were WOCLN," a women's voting group and "Democracy Matters!" The WOCLN encourages women of color and minorities to make a difference in this year's election.

Dawa Lokyitsang, a sophomore, said that is it especially important for women of color to vote. "It seems to me like a lot of youth is not voting and on top of that minorities are not and women of color are not voicing their demands," Lokyitsang said. "If you want change the vote, there are a lot of issues facing women of color."

Democracy Matters was there to educate students about public campaign funding and the idea of making it feasible for anyone to run in an election.

They mentioned that it seems like only very wealthy people run for president because of the high costs of campaigning. They want to "level the playing field" and give everyone a chance to run.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano stopped by the ballroom and was pleased that so many students are coming out to register and re-register.

"I hope students get involved in the election process and don't take for granted being a citizen," Gargano said.

He also wants the student body to become more engaged in campus Elections.

"Voting matters nationally as well as locally," he said.

Festivities for the afternoon included music from Boston's hip-hop station WIMN-FM (Jam'n 94.5) and live music from local band, "Barry Kingston and the Screaming Souls."

Jessica Acosta, of the WIMN's Street Team has visited all UMass campuses in the state to register voters and offered incentives for registering like free CD's, t-shirts and gift certificates.

Acosta said that the most prevalent issue that the youth population is facing today is tuition prices and healthcare.

The total number of people that came to register, or request and absentee ballot has not been compiled yet because applications are still coming into the Student Activities office and the Dorm Storm Team is still gathering voter registration forms.

If you wish to register to vote or obtain an absentee ballot application, please visit the Student Activities Center in the Student Union.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Students urged to vote in election

With Election Day drawing closer, there has been a lot more emphasis on today's youth to get out there and vote. And this year will be as key an election year as any for college students to stand out and have their voices heard. A lot of emphasis has been placed on younger voters, not so much from the presidential candidates, but from the country in general. There are many things that have been done by campus groups, as well as the government, to alleviate the voter registration process for students. For those who are not already registered to vote, students should take the initiative and get registered, regardless of whom they plan on voting for.

According to www.registerandvote2004.org, a site dedicated to helping young Americans get involved with the upcoming election by informing them on the issues and helping them register to vote, the 18-21 year-old demographic was first permitted to vote in 1972. Electoral participation among Americans under age 25 since then has declined 13 percent. As a direct result of the decline in student voting, many on-campus groups are attempting to assist those not yet registered to vote. One group, specifically, aiming to help students this election year is MassPIRG (Massachusetts Public Interest Relations Group).

During the first day of classes, MassPIRG representatives spoke to students during the first few minutes of class regarding the importance of voting. One argument that was mentioned were the dopies of some of the issues that the presidential candidates were focused on, one being prescription medication. Older Americans are the ones who are voting, and therefore, are more often addressed by the candidates. MassPIRG representatives concluded their speeches by handing out voter registration forms to all students who were not registered.

There was also a federal law set in place in 1998 that requires colleges and universities to alleviate the voter registration process for students. According to an article published in Scripps Howard News Service, an online news service based in Washington D.C., in a survey recently released by Harvard's Institute of Politics and The Chronicle of Higher Education, 16.9 percent of those institutions surveyed complied with the 1998 amendment to the Higher Education Act that requires colleges to obtain voter-registration forms 120 days before the local registration deadline and distribute them to all students.

For those UMass students who are not well-versed in the literature of the presidential election, www.registerandvote2004.org offers a lot of information on the candidates, including direct links to all the major news organizations' coverage of the election such as CNN, NBC and many more. The website also offers information and links on all the political parties' websites, along with biographies of all the candidates. In addition, the website includes many of the popular television commercials available for viewing that are encouraging people to vote.

This year, many celebrities, in particular a lot of hip-hop artists such as Sean "P. Diddy" Combs and Fat Joe are appearing in many commercials encouraging young Americans to vote. With all the publicity surrounding the upcoming election, many public figures have been throwing themselves out there in an attempt to gain more awareness to America's youth regarding the election. All students who have not already registered to vote are greatly encouraged to register and participate in the 2004 presidential election.

UMass alumna Casey Kane: Collegian legend not forgotten

Erika Lovley

Thename may mean nothing to you, but to the staff at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Casey Kane is a legend.

Casey Kane was an Editor-in-Chief and Sports Editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. She was also a Red Sox fan, a UMass student and a friend.

The last time she darkened the doors of the Collegian was when she graduated from the journalism program in May of 1999 — but the mark she left on the newspaper and the people who make it flourishes still today.

Here at the Collegian, our family grows by the day. We are constantly gaining new writers, meeting new people and branching out in the UMass community. However on May 19, our newspaper lost a member who may arguably have been its finest. Casey Kane died of pneumonia due to complications with lymphoma treatment. She was 28.

I do not remember Casey. She graduated several years before I had even heard of the Collegian. But sitting here at the news desk on an unremarkable weeknight in the newsroom, I have a very good sense of who she was. There is a common thread that bonds every person who ever holds a position in the newsroom — the love of journalism.

Casey was, first and foremost, a Collegian writer. Awarded 12 varsity letters for tennis, field hockey, swimming and soccer, she was not unique simply because of her athletic prowess.

The Holyoke native aspired to be a professional sports writer — an admirable challenge for any woman in a genre of journalism that is still dominated by men.

She began immediately as a freshman, walking the trail of a sports reporter across Garber Field, Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium and the Mullins Center, impressing everyone she came into contact with, from her fellow reporters to the athletes she covered.

When she became Editor-in-Chief, the most highly regarded position on the paper; Casey didn't just make sure the papers hit the press on time and that every headline was balanced, well reported and clear. She did much more.

Casey made the Collegian a fun place to work — a daunting and often impossible task for any leader in an environment where a night can stretch from 5 p.m. until 3 a.m., where the pressure of up-to-the-minute deadlines, chronic exhaustion and endless criticism from the outside community can sometimes cause the desk editors themselves to question why they don't throw down the pen and notebook, climb the stairs of the Campus Center and rejoin the world of regularly-sleeping, socially active UMass students.

It's a story like Casey's that lifts our spirits, and keeps us vying for the most captivating interview or that perfect photograph.

According to her friends and coworkers, when Casey worked at the Collegian, she made the newsroom feel much like it does today — like a family. Matt Vautour, a close friend and former Collegian Editor-in-Chief himself, said, "She liked people liking to be in her company."

"She was the closest thing the Collegian ever had to a rock star — and held that role modestly and effortlessly," wrote Julie Fialkow, a former Collegian staff writer. "I have never met a woman like Casey before and I know I never will."

Casey's gleaming personality continued even in January of 2000, when she was first diagnosed with Hodgkins disease, a form of lymphoma.

"In typical Casey fashion, she was often scared to talk about her illness. Mostly, she was scared about how other people would react, so she sheltered many of us," wrote Jon Solomon, a co-worker at the Anderson Independent Mail, where Casey covered University of South Carolina sports after college when she was first diagnosed.

As her blonde hair fell out and regrew brown and curly due to chemotherapy treatments, Casey refused to let those around her be worried with her illness, humorously dyeing her hair funky shades of red, and referring to her treatment as "Keno Therapy."

"She said all you had to do was pick the right numbers," said Vautour, who shaved his head to match Casey's the first time she lost her hair.

Her struggle with lymphoma was long and tiring. Not one or two, but three bouts of recurring cancer and treatment dotted her life for over two years. To this day, Vautour still carries with him an everyday reminder of Casey's struggle — the top of his head has remained bald from her second chemotherapy session.

"I'm not ready to change it yet," he said.

Although many of us never knew her, Casey is still very much a part of the Collegian. Sometimes late at night, when every computer is humming, the coffee is being passed around and we all joke and laugh while rushing to finish the next day's issue before deadline, the names of old Collegian legends begin to haunt our conversations.

We tell stories of old writers and editors who grew from writing previews of on-campus lectures to gracing the front pages of the Boston Globe, the newscasts of ESPN and hosting radio shows all over the nation. We tell stories of people who typed on these very computers in the basement of the Campus Center and dreamed as big as we do — dreams of following the passion that first led us all to the Collegian.

As time goes on, some of the names begin to sink into the shadows. But unlike a good news story — current today, old tomorrow — the name of one Collegian legend will always be timely: Casey Kane.

Too much faith in the news

Ramzi Kanazi

After paying attention to recent news, election politics seem to be more confusing than ever. Could we, as Americans, be less informed due to media strategies of misinformation? We are barraged with stories of our candidates' previous military service, exposés of their wives and 527 ads that attack their characters. We hear so many perspectives on the same issue; it's impossible to accept any single source.

To further exacerbate the situation, journalists in the New York Times and USA Today have extensively fabricated their articles. Both of these papers are among the most widely distributed in the nation. Yet, can we trust them? Furthermore, if reputable papers can be so misleading, how could we trust those that have not made their mark? What's a registered voter to do?

Dan Rather recently presented a story on Sept. 8 concerning Bush's service in the National Guard on the news program "60 Minutes." Prior to this report, rampant controversy had surrounded Bush's enlistment in the military. A scattered paper trail barely substantiates Bush's purported military service. On the program, former Texas House Speaker Ben Barnes discussed how he assisted Bush's approval to the Guard. Barnes saved Bush from risking death in overseas combat. In addition, "60 Minutes" presented memos that suggest Bush's absence of duty and failure to report to a physical examination. Bush has stated on numerous occasions that he performed his duty to our nation during a time of war. The documents that Rather displayed indicate otherwise.

Fox News reporters have been questioning the authenticity of the documents Rather used in his report. They have stated that the documents have been forged. ABC has reported that two CBS employees raised concern about the reliability of the documents to their employer while strongly advising the documents be withdrawn from "60 Minutes." CBS, however, has reconfirmed their stance in response to the reports of the other leading networks. It seems like another grudge match.

While this may be an interesting conflict, many are left in a much-compromised position. How can we know whether to trust our president regarding his military service? Is Bush's elusive service in the National Guard even as important as his use of the military during his current term as president of the United States?

While we must be vigilant in our reception of reported news, we must also be careful not to lose focus on the issues that will concern us most in the future.

Do we really need to look so deeply at his prior military service to understand that this president just might be deceiving us? When will the media report that deception is part of the job description and that voters vote for the best liar? Clinton didn't lie to us. Nixon—nope—definitely not a liar. Reagan didn't lie to us either, and I'm not lying to you right now. I'm part of the media, and we never lie.

Ask Dan Rather; those documents are real. Jayson Blair authenticated them.

The follies of our headline media are clouding the most important concerns of voters. While we must be vigilant in our reception of reported news, we must also be careful not to lose focus on the issues that will concern us most in the future. These issues may differ among individuals, but they are not the diatribes of networks embattled for ratings. Although they are entertaining, the result of electing a president based on media squabbles and pernicious reporting will not be so amusing.

Still, the question remains, how do we become more informed about our presidential candidates? We need the media so that we can learn what the candidates intend to do with the next four years.

While many of us will not get all the information that we seek from typical news sources, most of us can find what we are looking for by simply ignoring the most ostentatious headlines and spending some time on the rest of the paper. Skip the front page. Search news sites online for specific information. Listen to NPR instead of Bill O'Reilly (or in addition to—depending on how much you can take). Finally, the best way to learn who should be president is obviously by reading the op/ed columns. We'll tell you whom to vote for. That's why UMass elections are smooth-sailing.

Time flies when growing up

Becky Martins

Age is not always "just a number." Sometimes, it is necessary to realize that the time has come to face reality and grow up.

The people we are upon entering college and who we have become by graduation are two different individuals. After high school, we set out to begin our undergraduate work not knowing what to expect. If we are lucky, we attend our first choice college, instead of settling for a safety school.

Very few of us have prior knowledge of what it means to be independent either. But for many, when the time comes to finally accept that hard-earned diploma, we realize how drastically things have changed in four years. Unless we are continuing on to graduate school, the long road of formal education is over. What lies ahead is the real test in which our years of classroom experience will be put to use. But what if we did not know what direction we wanted life to take? Sure, many begin college with a clear picture of what the forthcoming years will hold, but there are also those whose visions are somewhat cloudier.

Growing up in the United States, we were told from an early age that the future held no limit. Nothing was out of reach, whether we wanted to become a professional athlete or the first female president. What really mattered was that we dreamt big and worked hard at attaining these goals. After all, were we not living the American Dream?

As we entered our final years of high school, college became more of a reality. We sought schools that had appealing academic programs as well as social scenes, declared our majors and headed off in the fall ready to begin this next chapter of our lives. But upon arriving at campus and beginning class, many individuals, including myself, quickly realized they were in for a rude awakening.

It is safe to say I hate change. Anyone who knows me would also say I am not good at making decisions that are final and life determining. So how unreasonable is it that I have changed my major at least 6 times since coming to UMass Amherst a year ago?

It seems that as soon as I figure out what I want to do, something else seems more appealing. And honestly, having to seriously decide what I will "do with my life" is much too final. In my eyes, I am far from being mature enough to be making these types of decisions, yet my parents, the university and the rest of society seem to think otherwise.

I had realized, however, that last week the time had come to grow up. Here I was, a first semester sophomore on her last semester of General Education courses. After this, there are no more "filler" classes left to take while I tried to decide what step to take after that, but it did not faze me until recently. I was sitting in a School of Management open house, thinking maybe a business degree would fit me well for this month at least, when it hit me. As I sat listening to the professor, I realized I had none of the prerequisites to get into any of the programs. What made matters worse was that I realized it would take me a full year just to become qualified to apply. Suddenly time did not seem so ample. I realized it was time to seriously take a good look at my future. I may have a 3.7 grade point average and work hard in all my classes, but I surely was not making much progress.

I advise students to take the time to take a variety of classes: ruling out what could never be pursued as a career, while finding subjects that spark interest. While taking these courses, however, be aware of the big picture.

In response to my eye-opening experience, for the past seven days my schedule has become packed with different departmental advisor appointments, hours spent on UMass' website researching majors and copious advice from friends about which majors are worth pursuing. Although it has only been a week, it feels good to have a little direction. I may not be exactly certain of how the rest of my college years will be spent, but at least I am now giving them some serious thought.

When I tell people I am a sophomore, they say I am young and have plenty of time to figure things out. And while I do realize my situation could be worse, why let it get to that point? I advise students to take the time to take a variety of classes: ruling out what could never be pursued as a career, while finding subjects that spark interest. While taking these courses, however, be aware of the big picture. Make the best of our time here and have a good experience, but do not fall behind and struggle to catch up. We are paying thousands of dollars a year in tuition for a reason.

Emmys 2004: this year's winners

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) - "Frasier," "Friends" and "Sex and the City" were taking a final Emmy Awards bow Sunday.

HBO's "Sex and the City" was the leading comedy nominee at the 56th Annual Primetime Emmy Awards, with 11 bids including ones for best—comedy series and for star Sarah Jessica Parker.

Kelsey Grammer and David Hyde Pierce of "Frasier" and Jennifer Aniston and Matt LeBlanc of "Friends" were nominated for acting trophies.

The three comedies ended this past season. "Frasier," which aired for 11 years, had a chance to add to its record 31 Emmys, including five best comedy series awards and a three acting awards each for Grammer and Pierce.

The most nominated drama series was HBO's "The Sopranos" with 20, including bids for James Gandolfini and Edie Falco. Although both actors have won before, the mob story has yet to snatch the top drama award.

Its competition includes NBC's four-time winner "The West Wing."

HBO's miniseries "Angels in America," the leading nominee with 21 bids, tried to ascend to record Emmy heights. The drama about the AIDS crisis in the 1980s won four awards at the Sept. 12 creative arts ceremony for craft achievements and was competing in seven categories Sunday.

The benchmarks: "Eleanor and Franklin," whose 11 awards in 1976 are the most for any program in one season, and "Roots," the most — honored miniseries with nine awards in 1977.

Awards in 27 categories were to be presented at the ceremony broadcast by ABC.

The third Bob Hope Humanitarian Award was to be presented posthumously to actor, producer and philanthropist Danny Thomas, with his daughter, actress Marlo Thomas, accepting.

HBO led the nominations with its highest ever total, 124. NBC was second with 65, followed by CBS with 44, Fox with 31 and ABC with 33. PBS earned 27 nominations. The awards are given by the Academy of Television Arts & Sciences.

HBO was the top network with 124 nominations, including the hit series 'The Sopranos.'

'Less is more' this weeks rule

Style 101
Monique Jemmott

From a young age I have had always had stars in my eyes when it comes to fashion. Throughout the years I have experimented with my look and gone through every phase imaginable.

First there was the hip-hop, baggy jeans and shirt phase in junior high— I wore all of my clothes backwards, and big enough to fit another person. From there I moved on to the teen pop queen world, with Brandy and Monica as my idols. I felt it necessary to copy everything that they did, not realizing that the things they wore were made to wear on TV, and that a large electric blue faux fur coat and matching eye shadow are not appropriate for school.

My next phase was the Erykah Badu phase — enough said. But ultimately through all of this trial and error, I learned lessons that delivered me to my personal style, and one golden rule when it comes to fashion and style: less is more.

Less is more; a mantra that I know and live by and center my look around because it works so well. This is not to be confused with being a plain Jane. I still enjoy the idea of being glamorous when it comes to getting dressed, but I now know that I don't need a short dress, high heels, a head full of curls and a fur coat to make the outfit complete. I can now focus on one feature I want to highlight and work around it.

If I wear a pair of 6 inch stilettos, then I know that I may want to hold off on the micro mini; and if my jacket is very elaborate and stands out a lot, then I know that a pair of jeans and a plain t-shirt or tank may do it more justice than anything else. Less is more is about balance, as well as avoiding the biggest fashion faux paux of all time — over excessiveness.

Pop Princess gets hitched

'Oops' she did it again; Britney weds Federline in private ceremony

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Pop singer Britney Spears married her fiance, dancer Kevin Federline, in a surprise ceremony, her record label said Sunday.

"She did marry him yesterday," Jive Records spokeswoman Sonia Muckle said. She declined to provide further details.

The wedding was held Saturday evening at a private home in the Studio City area with 20 to 30 people attending, 'Entertainment Tonight' said on its Web site.

Nicole King, a spokeswoman for BWR Public Relations, which represents Spears, did not return a message seeking comment.

Spears, 22, and Federline, 26, announced their engagement in June after dating since early this year.

It was the second marriage in nine months for Spears.

In January, she married childhood friend Jason Alexander in a surprise wedding in Las Vegas. That marriage was annulled 55 hours later.

Spears' label said Spears and Alexander had taken a joke too far. The bride wore a baseball cap and torn jeans down the aisle and was escorted by a casino limousine driver.

Federline appeared in the movie 'You Got Served' and performed as a backup dancer for singer Justin Timberlake. Spears' former boyfriend.

He was previously involved with actress Shar Jackson of TV's 'Moesha.' They have two children, a 2-year-old and a newborn.

Miss America begins quest for cure

Alabama native speaks of plans to help fight child cancer

'Miss America' Deidre Downs plans to use her crown for good by helping fight childhood cancer.

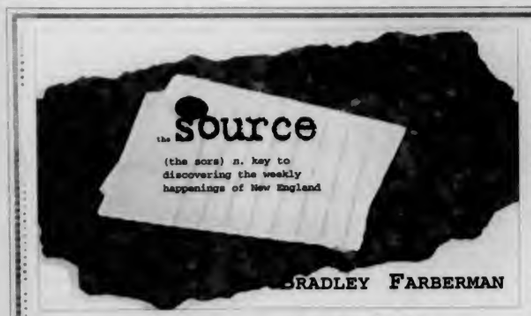
By John Curran
Associated Press

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. - Deidre Downs passed up medical school so she could compete for Miss America. Now she plans to spend her reign advocating for pediatric cancer victims.

"People don't like to associate cancer with children," she said Sunday. "Children with cancer need a voice, and I want to be that voice."

Downs, of Birmingham, Ala., outlasted 51 other women to win the pageant Saturday, impressing the judges with her smarts, beauty and singing prowess. Competing head-to-head against Miss Louisiana, Jennifer Dupont, Downs turned in a strong performance singing "I'm Afraid This Must Be Love."

The 5-foot-10 1/2-inch brunette graduated magna cum laude from Samford University in Birmingham. A Rhodes Scholar finalist, she was accepted to the University of Alabama's medical school in Birmingham but delayed her entry after winning the Miss Alabama title on her fifth try.



"I guess I was just a sucker for punishment," she said.

Downs paid her way through college using nearly $50,000 in scholarship money won competing for Miss Alabama. She'll get $50,000 more for winning Miss America and could make several times that much in appearance fees during her yearlong reign.

Downs' victory capped a shorter Miss America telecast that showed more skin and fewer talent routines. Whether the changes succeeded isn't known yet. Nielsen Media Research ratings come out later this week.

Deidre Downs receives her crown as the new Miss America.

Philly Orchestra members extend contract

By Marylaire Dale
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Philadelphia Orchestra officials and musicians decided shortly before a Sunday midnight deadline to extend their contract for 30 days, ending the threat of an immediate strike.

As a result, the 104-year-old orchestra, renowned worldwide for its string section and lush 'Philadelphia Sound,' will open its 2004-05 season as scheduled Tuesday night.

Representatives of the orchestra's 109 unionized members had walked out of talks Friday, balking at management's position on salaries, pension cuts and a possible reduction in the orchestra's size, and a day later authorized a strike.

Officials said the talks would set the tone for pending orchestra negotiations in three other large U.S. cities, including Cleveland.

Steve Albertini, a management spokesman, said musicians must help the orchestra cut its budget from $38.6 million this fiscal year to $35.7 million in the coming year.

The orchestra, despite filling more than 90 percent of its seats, has run deficits in all but one of the last nine years, he said. But a balanced budget is a condition of several large gifts pledged as part of a $125 million endowment campaign, he said.

'We realize that the only product that we really have is the lush sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra,' Albertini said. 'However, if we are not a fiscally responsible organization, we are not going to have a Philadelphia Orchestra down the road.'

The administration trimmed more than $2.4 million of its expenses, including cutting its staff from 78 two years ago to 65 today, while seeking $1.8 million in cuts and revenue-generating proposals from musicians, Albertini said.

Union spokesman Dan Fee said management was dismissive of suggestions the musicians put forth during the five months of negotiations.

In 1996, Philadelphia Orchestra members struck for nine weeks before the two sides reached an accord.

The union members, who belong to Local 77 of the American Federation of Musicians, include 106 musicians and three librarians.

The musicians' current minimum salary is $105,040, although principal players and some other members earn substantially more.

The orchestra, which owns its former venue, the Academy of Music, now pays rent at its new home down the street in the $265 million Kimmel Center for the Performing Arts, which opened in 2001.

'Sky Captain and the World of Tomorrow' proves strong

By Alex Vega
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The debut flight of 'Sky Captain and the World of Tomorrow' landed the No. 1 weekend box office spot with an estimated $16.2 million amid an overall lackluster turnout at theaters.

The $70 million, film-noir-styled fantasy starring Jude Law, Gwyneth Paltrow and Angelina Jolie cast its live actors against digitally animated giant robots on a backdrop of 1930s New York.

The film was originally slated to debut during the summer blockbuster season, but distributor Paramount pushed back the opening amid post-production delays.

"You got to figure, with a project like this, you don't know what the response is going to be from the audience," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of box office tracker Exhibitor Relations Co. "I think they maximized the potential of the movie by taking it out of the summer and putting it here because it was the only way it was going to be No. 1."

Wayne Lewellen, Paramount's head of distribution, acknowledged the film might have drawn a larger opening audience as a summer release.

'Absolutely. You have a larger audience in summer than in the fall,' Lewellen said. 'I thought we had a great date in June prior to the opening of 'Spider Man 2'). Unfortunately, they couldn't deliver the picture.'

The film drew a largely older audience, according to studio tracking, which estimated 70 percent of viewers were over 25. About 55 percent of the audience was male, Paramount said.

"Just the look of the picture, the kind of retro look, probably had an appeal to an older audience," Lewellen said, adding that he hopes the film will attract younger audiences in the coming weeks.

Two other debut films broke into the box office top 10.

Mr. 3000,' a baseball comedy starring Bernie Mac, grabbed the No. 2 spot with a $9.2 million. 'Wimbledon,' a romantic comedy starring Kirsten Dunst as a rising tennis player who falls for a fading tennis star played by British actor Paul Bettany, grabbed the No. 4 spot with $7.8 million.

Mac plays a retired, egotistical baseball star trying to make a comeback. It's the first leading film role for Mac, who stars in his own television show and has played several supporting characters in films like 'Ocean's 11' and 'Head of State.'

"For Bernie Mac it's solid, in the context of the time of year and how the box office has been in a slump," Dergarabedian said.

Zombie attack fest 'Resident Evil: Apocalypse,' starring Milla Jovovich as a bath-towel-wearing heroine, earned $9 million, a 61 percent tumble from its No. 1 debut last weekend.

"It's a pretty normal drop for the genre," said Rory Bruer, president of distribution for Sony Pictures.

'Wimbledon' appealed mostly to female viewers under 30, according to tracking by Universal Pictures.

"It's not a disappointment for us," said Paul Pflug, spokesman for the studio. 'It's a movie that opened well, and we believe it will have some playability in the United States.'

Overall traffic at movie theaters was down over the weekend. Viewership for the top 10 movies saw a decline of more than 25 percent compared to a year ago, when 'Underworld' led the box office, Dergarabedian said.

their way into this week's column, and for good reason of course. Seeing how women on this campus dress at a party makes me wonder what they're thinking when they get dressed. I know what I'm thinking when I put my clothes on: I want to look nice; sexy, yet tasteful, fashionable but not too trendy.

To me this is what looks good. I take lessons from some of my favorite stars: Halle Berry for instance. She is the queen of less is more. Her look is always sexy, and glamorous whether she's in an evening gown, or jeans and a T-shirt.

While at the party I took a survey of the people in the room (men and women) about what they were wearing. Sometimes it was painful, and a few times I saw what I was looking for: the balance. The people who looked good to me were the people who appeared not to try too hard. The ones who were conscious of the fact that every single thing does not have to match and the women who knew that they were beautiful without having to show off their entire bodies.

Another lesson I have learned is that being stylish doesn't happen over night. I consider myself stylish at this point, but it definitely hasn't always been that way. It took a lot of mishaps, mistakes and looking at old pictures saying — what was I thinking? But finally, I think I got it right. Even if you haven't made it there just yet, having the right idea about style can take you all the way.

fourth quarter for the only other ball he saw in the game.

Richmond tied the score with just under 11 minutes remaining in the second quarter when Tutt faked a handoff to running back David Freeman and ran through the UMass defense untouched for a 41-yard touchdown.

Chaos then broke loose during Richmond's final drive of the first half. After a six-yard run by Freeman to the Massachusetts 40-yard-line with nine seconds to play, the referees signaled that it was fourth down – a call that fired up Richmond coach Dave Clawson, who demanded a measurement.

After a short delay and conference by the referees, a measurement was granted and a first down was awarded to the Spiders.

"That was huge because it was a 14-14 game, and we barely get a first down. If we don't get that first down, we probably run out the clock," Clawson said.

On the next play, Tutt ran around in the backfield to buy some time for his receivers to get open. After evading UMass defenders and getting help from a huge block by Freeman, Tutt rolled to his left and slung the ball into the end zone to hit a wide-open Harry Wilson as time expired. Richmond took a 21-14 lead and momentum into the locker room at halftime.

Richmond then led a slow, methodical drive in the third quarter all the way down to the UMass nine-yard-line before Shannon James picked off a Tutt pass in the end zone to breathe new life into the Minutemen. Instead of starting the drive from their own 20-yard-line, though, the referees penalized the Minutemen 10 yards for excessive celebration.

A 16-yard pass to Dominique Stewart was then negated by the refs on the next play for an ineligible receiver downfield, and UMass was backed up to its 5-yard-line. The Minutemen were forced to punt and were flagged for kick-catching interference, which allowed Richmond to start their drive on the UMass 23-yard-line.

After only gaining four yards of offense on that drive, Joseph Fore kicked a 37-yard field goal that flattened UMass and sealed the game for the Spiders.

up its defense and held Siena without a scoring chance for the next 10 minutes of play.

Acting as an 11th offensive player as time ran down, Henry ran towards midfield during the 89th minute in hopes of gaining possession of the ball and pressuring the Minutemen one last time.

As the teams struggled at midfield, UMass sophomore Richie Higa gained control of a loose ball and chipped a shot over Henry into the net for a fourth and decisive goal.

"The last 12 minutes, we had good control of the ball, but they really pressured us and we just didn't defend as well as we needed to," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We shouldn't have let up any goals."

After defeating Siena, UMass hosted a heavily favored Harvard team that was fresh off Friday's 4-2 semifinal victory over Hartford.

UMass and the Crimson played to a physical stalemate until the Minutemen were charged with a costly penalty at 29:18. UMass junior defender Tim Kitchell was administered a red card for cleating a Harvard player who was on the ground.

As a result of the infraction, Massachusetts was forced to play man-down for the rest of the game.

Harvard wasted no time in taking advantage of the extra player and scored twice before the half expired.

At 14:56, William Craig assisted Crimson teammate Matt Hoff on a direct kick. The goal was Hoff's second of the season.

Six minutes later, Pablo Koe-Kropecher sent a corner kick to the left side of UMass goalie Nick Billman where it was controlled and netted by Anthony Tomaritis.

Action in the second half reflected the physical stalemate of the game's first 20 minutes, until Harvard increased its lead to three. Tomaritis assisted his brother Nicholas in the 79th minute to give Harvard a 3-0 lead.

Matty LeMire scored the lone Massachusetts goal with less than five-minutes to play.

The loss drops Massachusetts to 10-5-2 all-time in the Classic.

"No games are more important than others. We want to win every game we play, but this weekend does mean a little more because it's our home tournament," Koch said.

After the game, Minutemen Bullen, Lemire and Rob Charest were named to the all-tournament squad.

UMass returns to action Wednesday at Rudd Field to host New Hampshire at 3:30.

UMass sophomore Stephanie Barrett gets ready to pass the ball during a soccer game last season. The Minutewomen lost to Rhode Island 4-1 on Friday night.

widening the gap on the scoreboard two minutes later. Nelson made a nice cross to Megan Kasparek over the middle, and the midfielder brushed it nicely into the net to give the Rams a 3-0 advantage.

The Minutewomen continued to back away until something broke, and it did over the remainder of the second half. After Canfield's shot careened over the crossbar, and Blyler went down again (ankle), the Maroon and White began to play with a sense of urgency led by Fairweather that was too little too late.

With 15 minutes to go, Canfield began to circle the right end of the goal. As she began to close in on the keeper, she was tripped up, but not before she booted the ball back out to the top of the penalty area where a waiting Fairweather dished the ball off to freshman Jenny Roehrig. Roehrig fired a shot into the back of the net to close the gap to two.

That was as close as the Minutewomen would get, though. Freshman Jessica Gadd streaked down the left side of the field where she crossed the ball to Ionsdottir who booted it by Walker to once again for the game's final score.

Christine Tocco provided the foundation for the defensive teamwork with eight saves in the game.

As Maine invaded UMass' circle, Tocco stepped up her defense, making two clutch saves in succession with just five and a half minutes remaining.

"Everyone worked great defensively," Massachusetts head coach Patty Shea said. "Our defensive penalty corners were played very well, and everything clicked today."

Shea was also very proud of her goalkeeper's performance.

"Christine did everything right today," the veteran coach said. "She did exactly what she needed to do, and that was to save the savable shots. You really can't ask much more than that."

Maine had several opportunities to score, including five penalty corners, but failed to convert all of them.

"We have four different defensive formations that we use for penalty corners," Shea said, describing the strategies used against the Black Bears' corners. "Most of it can be explained by pure guts and reaction."

While the Maroon and White did come away with the victory, coach Shea was upset with the offensive production as a whole. UMass had three penalty corners of its own but failed to muster a shot on goal on all but one of them.

"We didn't execute a single penalty corner today," Shea said, "and we can't afford not to execute here at home. When we put one goal on the board, we have to want to score again."

This game was easily the Minutewomen's best performance, as they played aggressively from start to finish. The majority of the first half was spent in the Black Bears' half of the field, and Caitlin Bereda and Gina Sanders kept sophomore goalkeeper Jamie Morin on her toes.

Maine came out of the gates strong, posting nine of its 11 second half shots before Borneo scored the game-winner for the Minutewomen. The gratifying win could be just the thing to turn around the struggling Maroon and White's season.

"This victory is very satisfying for us," Shea said. "We worked really hard, and they earned this victory."

The Minutewomen return to action at Garber Field next weekend, with consecutive games on Saturday and Sunday afternoons. UMass will be hosting Connecticut on September 25 and Vermont a day later. The scheduled game time for both events is 1 p.m.

Men's cross country places second in rain

By Martha Powers
Collegian Correspondent

In weather conditions that would have cancelled any other sporting event, the Massachusetts men's cross-country team ran its first meet of the season. With the ground flooded and the rain continuing to come down, the Minutemen lost to Maine by a score of 29 to 32. Vermont finished third with 69 points.

Looking strong was junior Ryan Corbett, who finished second overall and was the first UMass runner to cruss the line. Running in his first collegiate race, freshman Nils Fischer finished behind Corbett, coming in third overall. Eighth place went to Paul Noone, ninth place to Matt Klypka and tenth place to Matt Clark.

"I felt great today despite the weather," Corbett said. "Even though we lost by three points, this race was a big step for the team. Considering half the team is freshmen, we are still getting used to running together. I am disappointed that we lost, but we are going to gain so much more in the long run that will help us with the big meets."

Despite the narrow loss, UMass coach Ken O'Brien was positive about the race.

"I am very happy with how everyone ran. Everyone handled the race and adverse conditions well," O'Brien said. "We had a close time-spread between our top five runners which is encouraging. We have a lot of potential."

O'Brien was especially pleased with how the freshmen preformed.

"Not only was this their first five-mile race, but the weather conditions were tough. Everybody ran well considering," O'Brien said.

The Minutemen will be in action next Saturday in Syracuse to race in the Orange Cross Country Classic.

Europe outclasses U.S. at Ryder Cup

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

BLOOMFIELD TOWNSHIP, Mich. (AP) - Over here, over there, it no longer matters. Europe again proved to be the best in the Ryder Cup with its biggest romp over the Americans.

The final blow Sunday was a scene all too familiar at Oakland Hills: With the cup already won, Padraig Harrington made a 25-foot par putt on the 18th hole of the last match that only counted in the record books.

Europe 18 1/2, United States 9 1/2.

It was the Americans' worst loss in the 77-year history of the Ryder Cup, and there was no doubt who the underdogs are now.

"We haven't been winning it," Davis Love III said. "If they keep bringing the cup back on their airplane, we are the underdog.

"It's a long two years until we get to do it again."

Lee Westwood ended the slightest suspense with a 4-foot par putt on the 18th to beat Kenny Perry with six matches left to be completed. Colin Montgomerie was 1 up on the 18th hole and assured a half-point, so Europe had the 14 points it needed to retain the cup.

Montgomerie also made a 4-foot par putt to beat David Toms and secure outright victory for Europe for the fourth time in the last five Ryder Cup matches.

The Europeans are not only winning, they are winning big.

"Obviously, our results would suggest that," Darren Clarke said. "We come here with a big heart, full of hopes, full of expectations."

The United States still leads the series 24-9-2, but Europe is closing in. It has captured the cup seven times in the last 10 matches with a collection of players not many people know in the States until they are posing with the 19-inch gold trophy.

"We came here again as underdogs. It's amazing how well we do," Montgomerie said. "I don't know how it happens."

The Americans haven't figured it out, either. They have the higher world ranking, more majors, greater star power.

But when it comes to the Ryder Cup, it's no contest.

The Europeans won for the third time on U.S. soil, and they made sure there was no rally like Brookline five years ago when the Americans stormed back from a 10-6 deficit by putting its best players at the top of the lineup and riding a tidal wave of momentum.

Tiger Woods finally did his part, the only player not to lose a single hole in an easy victory over Paul Casey. The Americans had early leads in the first five matches as cheers of "USA! USA!" rang out across the course, the crowd trying to urge them to pull off another improbable comeback.

But just as it had gone all week, the Americans simply couldn't keep it up.

Sergio Garcia made three straight birdies to quickly turn the tide against Phil Mickelson, then won the match when Lefty tried a peculiar shot at a crucial moment - a low punch that came up short and rolled into the water on the 16th.

Clarke was two holes behind with three to play when he made an 8-foot birdie on the 16th, chipped in from behind the green on the 17th to square the match and wound up halving his match with Love after both missed par putts.

Westwood also rallied from an early two-hole deficit, winning the 15th with a par to go 1 up, and then holing his cup-clinching putt to seal the victory.

"I had a fair idea the way everyone was biting their nails," Westwood said when asked whether he knew his putt was for the Ryder Cup.

This was no nail-biter. It was a rout from the start.

Europe led 11-5 going into the 12 singles matches and needed only three points to retain the cup. Five matches were still in progress when it clinched the cup, and the celebration was under way.

Fans began lustily singing "Ole, Ole, Ole, Ole!" and players swarmed captain Bernhard Langer with hugs. Garcia waved the European flag on the back of a cart, as he sped off to watch the final matches.

Champagne filled the air over the 18th green, and Langer took a sweet sip as his players roared.

"The Europeans are great," U.S. captain Hal Sutton. "They played ferociously. There are a lot of great players in America, but we got outplayed this week."

Fred Funk and Perry, in their first Ryder Cup, were the only players who failed to win a point. Mickelson went 1-3, while Woods had another losing record at 2-3.

Garcia and Westwood were the European stars, each going 4-0-1. And when Thomas Levet beat Funk for his first point of the week, he assured every European player contributed something to this record victory.

UMass drops its first game at McGuirk in two years

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team couldn't overcome a multitude of penalties or a tremendous performance by Richmond quarterback Stacy Tutt in a 24-14 loss to the Spiders on Saturday at a rain-soaked Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Richmond	24
UMass	14

UMass (2-1, 0-1 Atlantic 10) was penalized 15 times for 111 total yards, but it was more in the timing of the penalties that destroyed its rhythm in the game's final three quarters. The Minutemen weren't able to establish any sense of an offense after scoring all of their 14 points in the first quarter.

Richmond (2-1, 1-0 Atlantic 10) was only penalized six times for 40 yards in the game.

The real Achilles heel for UMass, however, was the stellar play of Tutt, who was named the Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week after he threw for two touchdowns and ran for another on Saturday. He amassed 117 yards on the ground and passed for 132 yards.

The Minutemen had contained Tutt and the Richmond offense on their first three drives, but midway through the first quarter, the Spiders' offense tied the score at seven on a touchdown drive that single-handedly told the entire game story.

Tutt began the drive with two straight runs of 16 yards and 13 yards, respectively. Later in the drive, on a third-and-six from the Massachusetts 40-yard-line, Tutt threw an incomplete pass at one of his offensive linemen, but UMass was flagged for defensive holding which resulted in a Richmond first down.

Three plays later, on third-and-13, Tutt broke a handful of tackles to avoid a sack and scampered from one side of the field to the other for a 15-yard gain and another first down.

Jason Peebler catches a pass against Richmond. Peebler had four receptions for 130 yards and a touchdown on Saturday.

"We had planned a lot of quarterback runs coming into the game, but until (Tutt) broke eight tackles on one scramble, it woke me up and I said that I need to call his number more," Richmond coach Dave Clawson said.

Tutt capped off the drive with a seven-yard touchdown pass to Brandon Neuman.

UMass only needed a three-play drive to retake its first-quarter lead as Tim Day hit wide receiver Jason Peebler on a 50-yard touchdown pass.

Peebler finished the first quarter with three receptions for 121 yards and the one touchdown.

It was a frustrating day after that for Peebler, however, who had a nagging hamstring injury all week that limited his action for the rest of the game. It was evident that the Massachusetts offense lost its first quarter momentum with Peebler on the sideline, as he only caught a nine-yard reception in the

UM falls to URI

The Massachusetts women's soccer team went into Friday night's match up with Rhode Island with a sense of determination lighting in its eyes.

"We were fired up more than we have been all season," sophomore defender Nadia Villaroel said.

But for one reason or another, be it missed scoring opportunities or trouble shutting down a speedy group of attackers, the Minutewomen (0-5, 0-1 Atlantic 10) weren't able to kick off the Atlantic 10 season in the fashion they would have liked to, falling to the Rams 4-1 under the lights.

"It's a shame we lost," coach Jim Rudy said. "You can't be satisfied with losing, but you know, I thought they did a great job. The big difference for me in this game was two things: their keeper made saves, and their players scored goals.

"I'm really pleased with their commitment out there. A lot of players stepped up. We had some good combinations out there. We just didn't get the goals. That was the difference."

The Rams (3-4, 1-0 A-10) received a majority of its contribution from several standout freshmen as Debra Nelson (two goals, one assist) and Thorunn Jonsdottir (one goal, one assist) led a high-speed offensive charge that proved to be a nuisance early on for the Maroon and White.

But UMass had plenty of chances, too.

"You look up at that scoreboard, and what do you see?" senior Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather said. "We took 14 shots; they took 15. There's not much of a difference there. What it really came down to was [URI] making their shots, and we weren't."

The Minutewomen got an up close and personal look at the young offense of the Rams early in the first half. Nelson provided a clamp-like pressure on the back four of UMass through the first portion of the first half, dishing off passes to Jonsdottir and twins Melanie and Megan Kasparek that were turned away, as well as taking shots herself that went wide.

It was only a matter of time before something broke for the Rams, and they found the back of the net in the 30th minute when Nelson took a feed from senior Claire Landon and embarked on a breakaway. Nelson fired one at goalie Kristin Walker, but the shot took a bad bounce off Walker's hands that took a seat in the top back corner of the net.

Nelson struck again just ten minutes later, this time through a scrum in the penalty area. The pass came from Jonsdottir, and the sliding Neslon tapped it right over Walker's head.

"That first goal was a piece of work," Rudy said. "[Nelson] was a real package in that first half, but they had a real funky system of play. It was real deceiving trying to pick it up. At times it looked like they only had one frontrunner, next thing you know the two Kasparek kids are no longer at midfield and are instead frontrunners. [Nelson and Jonsdottir] are two very good frontrunners."

But the Minutewomen didn't lose their cool. They played on and, through the remaining 20 minutes of the half, played even ball with the Rams. They got a scare when Adair Blyler went down with an ankle injury with 15 minutes to go, but freshman Britt Canfield came off the bench and gave the Rams some force of her own.

That pressure, however, surfaced more in the second stanza of the match, as Canfield continued to find ways to break through the defense and create scoring opportunities from almost every angle. Her first shot of the second half, a breakaway in the 51st minute, was saved by Carroll. A minute and a half later, she would come back stronger, this time almost flipping it right over a sliding Carroll.

The Rams responded to Canfield's hastiness, however, by

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (2-4) experienced the ebbs and flows of collegiate athletics this weekend as it hosted the 11th annual UMass Soccer Classic.

Friday, UMass defeated Siena (0-4-1) 4-2 in the first round of the Classic, but fell to Harvard (3-2) 3-1 yesterday to close out the tournament.

Junior captain Oral Bullen led the Maroon and White to victory Friday with his first two goals of the season.

Bullen picked up his first score four minutes into the game when he outraced the defense to a ball sent into the UMass zone by sophomore Rob Charest. Charest forced a Siena turnover at midfield and sent a pass to Bullen who ran down the pass and converted on the breakaway.

The Minutemen forced another scoring opportunity when, deep in the UMass zone, a Siena defender charged a lob with the intention of heading the ball to prevent it from going out of bounds. Anticipating a Siena misplay, UMass freshman Mike Mingione ran behind his man and received the ball after it sailed over the airborne Siena defender. With no one between him and the goalie, sophomore Ralph Pace rang a shot off the post.

The Saints capitalized on their good luck by controlling the rebound and driving the ball down the field where T.J. Melly found the back of the net during the 45th minute.

Mingione gave the Minutemen their lead back when he scored on an outside shot with 45 seconds left in the half. Mingione recorded his first collegiate goal after tucking a 25-yard shot under the crossbar.

As the second half got underway, UMass increased its lead to 3-1 with Bullen's second goal in the 62nd minute. Massachusetts net minder Colin Burns initiated the play by booming a free kick 60 yards downfield where it was headed into the offensive zone by freshman Matty Lemire. Lemire directed his header to Bullen, who finished the bang-bang play with a well-placed shot past a diving Patrick Henry of Siena. Burns and Lemire were credited with assists.

"It was just unbelievable, I don't think I've ever had a point before. It just sort of happened," Burns said. "It means a lot to me because I've been here for four years with [Bullen] and it felt great to set him up for the goal."

Siena managed to cut the lead once again with a Tom Santoro goal in the 66th minute to make the score 3-2.

Unwilling to give up the tying goal, UMass stepped

Pats keep rolling

TEMPE, Ariz. (AP) – When a team wins 17 in a row, some of them are bound to be ugly.

New England's 23-12 victory over the sputtering Arizona Cardinals on Sunday was one of those.

"What streak?" coach Bill Belichick said. "We're just trying to win a game."

That one-game-at-a-time approach has worked for almost exactly a year. After a bye next week, the Patriots (2-0) can tie the NFL record of 18 straight victories with a win at Buffalo on Oct. 3.

New England	23
Arizona	12

Corey Dillon gained 158 yards on 32 carries, and Tom Brady threw two first-half touchdown passes to Daniel Graham.

Eugene Wilson intercepted Josh McCown twice, leading to 10 points for the Super Bowl champions. Brady was 15-of-26 for 217 yards. He was intercepted twice.

But big performances didn't add up to big points.

New England drove to the Arizona 2-, 10- and 2-yard line in the second half, but had to settle for short field goals by Adam Vinatieri each time.

"It's frustrating," Brady said. "Sometimes you come out of these games almost with a sour taste in your mouth, knowing you could have performed so much better."

With the exception of a costly fumble, Dillon had the kind of day he envisioned when he left lowly Cincinnati after last season.

"I didn't come here to rot away and take L's," he said. "I wanted to be part of something that's a winning tradition, and this is it."

Wilson's second interception, on McCown's ill-advised pass into double-coverage, gave New England the ball at its 49 in the fourth quarter. Brady threw 27 yards to David Givens, one of his six catches for 118 yards. The drive stalled on fourth-and-1 at the 2, and Vinatieri's 24-yard field goal put New England up 23-12.

Givens got more playing time because Deion Branch was knocked out with a knee injury on the final play of the first half.

"A guys goes down, we have ammunition to hack him up," Givens said. "We have five guys (receivers) who can all play."

Arizona managed just 167 yards, 117 through the air and 50 on the ground. For the second week in a row, the Cardinals scored just one touchdown. Coach Dennis Green, who made his reputation on offense, was disgusted.

"We're not on the same page, and that's a shame," he said, "because system-wise, style-wise this is probably the best offense in the National Football League right now. It's hard to believe that we developed it. It's hard to believe that we created it and we don't know how to run it."

Repeatedly, Patriots linebacker Mike Vrabel had an untouched path to McCown, who was sacked five times, all in the first half.

Field hockey tops Maine

The Massachusetts field hockey team finally emerged from a six-game losing streak, beating Maine 1-0 at Garber Field for its first win of 2004.

UMass and Maine have not faced each other in ten years, but the Minutewomen continued their dominance over the Lady Black Bears by improving their all-time series record to 13-0-1. The Maroon and White remain unbeaten against the Maine since their first meeting in 1975.

Junior midfielder Patricia Borneo scored an unassisted goal, which ended a 329-minute scoreless stretch for the Minutewomen, and gave them the lead to stay. UMass previously hadn't scored since a September 5 home game against Harvard.

During a strong attack on the Maine defense, Marije Tigchelaar attempted a pass to Borneo that was intercepted. Borneo managed to recover the ball once more, getting off a shot that found the back of the net with 4:30 remaining in the second half. The goal was Borneo's first of the season.

In the first half of the game, Borneo was unable to get a single shot off against the defense of the Black Bears.

"We talked to [Borneo] about making adjustments at halftime, and she had an excellent second half," Shea said. The adjustments proved to be the key needed for Borneo to net the Minutewomen's game-winner.

The UMass defense was the strongest it has been all season, receiving excellent work from Katelyn Woolfrey, Kwylan Iaggassar, Kara Murphy and Tigchelaar. Senior goalkeeper

Controversial 'sexual' mural graces lobby of John Quincy Adams dorm

By Mike Travis
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students residing in John Quincy Adams dorm in Southwest Residential Area are enjoying more than just speedy new elevator rides this semester — they are admiring the lively decor in the lobby.

The lobby of JQA is now adorned with a reproduction of Hieronymus Bosch's somewhat controversial painting, "The Garden of Earthly Delights."

"There is a lot of sexual and hidden innuendo in this piece," said senior JQA resident Jennifer Loiselle. "You can't really get around that the first thing that it makes you think of is sex."

Created by students and staff from the Hampden Gallery located in the middle of Southwest Residential Living Area — the work of art was funded by Housing Services in collaboration with the Fine Arts Center.

Hampden Gallery Manager John Simpson, who directed the project, said that the Bosch painting is a part of the ongoing effort to beautify places on campus — particularly in Southwest.

"The Bosch Project has so much detail. It has an interesting combination of humans, animals, plants, minerals and mastery of color and depth," Simpson said.

Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life, proposed such beautification efforts to change students' perception of Southwest shortly after a series of on-campus disturbances and a riot took place in Southwest last fall.

The reproduction is an extreme close-up of the center panel from the original Bosch painting, which was created in Northern Europe in 1500.

According to Simpson, there was a mutual consensus between the artists and Housing Services to take artistic liberties with the painting, in particular, removing all genitalia in the reproduction.

"It was painted in 1500, and even 500 years later it still seems scandalous," said Simpson. "We cleaned it up a little bit, but still kept it edgy."

Hampden Gallery Director Anne LaPrade said it would be insulting to assume college students couldn't handle the painting. "Real life is challenging and brutal ... we had to be willing to withstand controversy," LaPrade said.

Still, some think the "Rated-G" version of the painting is an insult to their maturity and has only added to the Southwest stigma.

"I think that if they didn't want any genitalia, they should have picked another painting for the dorm since the whole point of that painting is sex and sin," said a member of residence life staff, who wishes to remain anonymous. "I find it very ironic that it is in JQA. Residential Life has wanted to stop JQA from being a hotspot for partying and riots, but this painting in a way just confirms that this type of behavior happens here and it is okay."

It took two-and-a-half months to build the frame and complete the acrylic painting. Bosch left no clues behind as to the themes and subject matter that went into the painting and there has been little consensus on its meaning, except that it represents the realms of potentiality, action and consequences.

Umass graduate student Dan Miller and senior Kelly Fuller, both worked on the large-scale project.

"It was a little overwhelming and I had my doubts if it was going to get done, but it did," said Miller.

Fuller, who just finished the painting program at the University, said it was a great opportunity and rare for art students to be involved with such a large-scale project.

A larger, three-piece triptych version of the Bosch painting will be placed in Hampden Gallery during Christmas and should remain on display throughout the spring semester.

$781,774 education grant awarded to associate professor

Associate Professor Mary Lynn Boscardin.

Mary Lynn Boscardin, associate professor in the department of Student Development and Pupil Personnel Service, was recently awarded a four-year $781,774 federal grant to improve special education and administration training.

The grant comes from the U.S. Department of Education and will be used to train administrators to better serve students with disabilities and special education needs.

Participants in the grant will first be required to take special and general education administration courses, after which they will be placed into internship positions at local- and federal/state-level agencies in order to understand how these agencies interact with federal policies.

Students will have direct experience with how policy influences practice. Course work and internships allow participants to discover the relationship between federal/state- and local-level policies.

For example, not all schools are complying with IDEA (Individuals with Disabilities Education Act). When schools are out of compliance, federal funding to the state is at risk not only for education, but for all state agencies receiving federal funding. This has forced politicians not to go after failing schools for fear of losing funding and the next election.

Interns will also learn to better understand and help students from diverse backgrounds. This will be done by having them intern in places that are linguistically, racially, ethnically or socio-economically different from what they are used to.

Boscardin says it is important for interns to be open to learning about people from backgrounds that are different from their own, because they will not know exactly where they will be working.

She feels that internships are very important in any field because they tie what is lectured in the classroom to practice.

"[The internship experience is] having enough latitude to allow participants to pursue a plan that best meets their needs while meeting grant competence requirements," she said.

Many people enter into internships thinking they know exactly what they want to do, only to find other opportunities available to them, she said.

By working in many different areas of the field the intern is exposed to a range of opportunities, so that their perspective of work available is broadened and they do not feel limited to their original choice, she said.

The Taste of Russia comes to Amherst

Like the great Russian city of St. Petersburg — which was built on a miserable swamp near the Gulf of Finland — the Taste of Russia festival was built on the miserable swamp that was the Amherst Town Common Saturday. Despite the dismal weather, cheerful festival-goers turned out in galoshes and rain-coats, whether it was to attend a performance by the Amherst Regional High School Hurricanes; to talk with William Taubman, the Pulitzer-Prize-winning author of "Khrushchev: The Man and His Era;" or if it was just to grab a hot bowl of borscht — or beet soup.

"This morning it was torrential rain and there were still people coming out," said Paul Richardson, publisher of Russian Life magazine, which organized the festival along with Larrabee Enterprises.

Larry Stevens, the president of Larrabee Enterprises, acknowledged that the weather probably kept some people inside, but still felt that the turnout was good. Next year, he wants to have two tents instead of one. He said that they've already booked the same spot on the Amherst Town Common for Sept. 17, 2005.

The fifth Taste of Russia festival was the first to be held outside of Vermont, and the organizers expect to start having it in Amherst in the future.

Underneath the big white tent, over 3,000 "Russophiles" from different parts of the country came to enjoy the festivities, according to the festival's Web site. Richardson said that there were people there that had come from as far away as Alaska and Texas. However, Olga Bush of Waterford, Conn., didn't feel the festival was worth the trip.

"It was more disappointing. I anticipated more people, and they've been advertising for quite a long time. There's not a big variety of foods," said Bush.

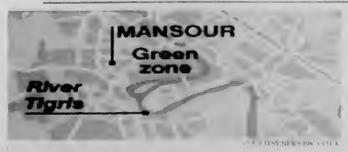
Bush's seven-and-a-half year old daughter, Natalia, didn't seem to mind the lack of variety. She munched on her honey cake and said that she liked "the funny guy."

Natalia may have been referring to Creative Director of Circus Smirkus — a circus made up of kid performers — Troy Wunderle, who worked Saturday as a circus performer.

Following his juggling/magic act, Wunderle opened up three great boxes filled with juggling balls, pins, rubber plates, and other circus items.

Children and adults gathered around him to learn how to juggle balls and balance plates, giving Wunderle a Pied Piper appearance.

The circus is popular in Russia, and Wunderle said he'd trained with many Russian circus coaches. "It's amazing, the talent that comes out of there," said Wunderle.



Other festival-goers came to shop at the tents of Russian crafts. For sale were Matrioshkas (decorative Russian nesting dolls), wooden carvings, hand-painted silk scarves, painted eggs, and ornate jewelry boxes, among other things. Crafts could also be purchased from Father Deacon Robert Alexander Hubiak, who was putting all the money he collected toward the Iraqi video shows beheading of American

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A video posted Monday on a Web site showed the beheading of a man identified as American civil engineer Eugene Armstrong. The militant group led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi claimed responsibility for the slaying and said another hostage — either an American or a Briton — would be killed in 24 hours.

The grisly decapitation was the latest killing in a particularly violent month in Iraq, with more than 300 people dead from insurgent attacks and U.S. military strikes over the past seven days. Earlier Monday, gunmen in Baghdad assassinated two clerics from a powerful Sunni Muslim group that has served as a mediator to release hostages.

The video of the beheading of the man believed to be Armstrong surfaced soon after the expiration of a 48-hour deadline set earlier by al-Zarqawi's Tawhid and Jihad Group for the beheading of the three civil engineers. The men — Armstrong, American Jack Hensley and Briton Kenneth Bigley — were abducted Thursday from their homes in a wealthy Baghdad neighborhood.

A militant whose voice resembled al-Zarqawi, who has been linked to al-Qaida, read a statement in the video saying the next hostage would be killed in 24 hours unless all Muslim women prisoners are released from U.S. military jails.

"You, sister, rejoice. God's soldiers are coming to get you out of your chains and restore your purity by returning you to your mother and father," he said before grabbing the hostage, seated at his feet, and cutting his throat.

In Washington a U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Armstrong's body had been recovered, but the official would provide no information about where or when.

The taped beheading appears to be of Armstrong, but the CIA is still reviewing the tape to be sure, the official said.

The 9-minute tape, posted on a Web site used by Islamic militants, showed a man seated on the floor, blindfolded and wearing an orange jumpsuit — similar to the orange uniform worn by prisoners at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba — with his hands bound behind his back. Five militants dressed in black stood behind him, four of them armed with assault rifles, with a black Tawhid and Jihad Group banner on the wall.

The militant in the center read out a statement, as the hostage rocked back and forth and side to side where he sat. After finishing, the militant pulled a knife and cut his throat until the head was severed.

The victim gasped loudly as blood poured from his neck. His killer held up the head at one point, and placed it on top of the body.

"The fate of the first infidel was cutting off the head before your eyes and ears. You have a 24-hour opportunity. Abide by our demand in full and release all the Muslim women, otherwise the head of the other will follow this one," the speaker said.

Gov. Romney expects Bush to win presidential elections

BOSTON (AP) — Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, the most prominent champion for President Bush in Massachusetts, said Monday that he expects Democratic rival John Kerry to win the presidential debates — but for Bush to ultimately win the election.

"On points, my guess is John Kerry will win handily," Romney said. "On who wins the debates in terms of getting votes, I think it will be the president."

Romney said that Kerry is a sharp debater, showing great command of facts and recall in a debate with former Gov. William Weld in Kerry's 1996 re-election campaign.

"I think John Kerry is a very skilled, effective debater, but I think that the qualities of character that are associated with presidency will suggest that President Bush will end up stronger following the debates even though I don't think they expect him to win on points," Romney said.

Democrats warned not to be fooled by Republicans who downplay the president's debating prowess.

"He won the governorship against Ann Richards who was no slouch as a public speaker and debater in large part because he performed so well that year," state Democratic Party Chairman Phil Johnston said. "In the Gore/Bush debates it's fair to say he did well against Gore. Now he's been the incumbent president for four years, he should perform very well."

building of an Orthodox church in Danbury, Conn.

The Taste of Russia started on Friday night with a VIP Dinner and vodka tasting at Hotel Northampton. Those present at the event heard Pulitzer Prize winner William Taubman speak about his book on Khrushchev. As a teaser, Taubman pointed out that one of the things people most remember Khruschev doing — pounding his shoe on the United Nations table — may not really have happened.

"There are no actual photos of it," said Taubman.

Just down the road, Amherst College had a Russian Animation Film Fest in the Stirn Auditorium and a Russian Art Show in the Mead Art Museum. In the evening, the Tsiganov Brothers Jazz Quintet played in the Buckley Recital Hall.

One of the most popular stands was the one selling Russian food. The Taste of Russia offered borscht, pelmeni (Russian dumplings), baklava, honey cakes, and a walnut shaped pastry.

"I tried all the deserts. I thought the honey cake was the best," said Rebecca Mueller, a student at Smith College and member of the Russian Club.

Some people ran into a comical problem after acquiring stickers from zealous volunteers that said, "YES! I Speak Russian!" and then became confused when fellow fairgoers started speaking to them in Russian.

Festival participant John Ledes said that attending the festival was an opportunity to get in touch with his family heritage. His grandfather came to America from Sukhumi, in the former Soviet Republic of Georgia. "It's delightful, it's a wonderful idea," he said.

Next year's festival may be a year away, but organizers are already planning the next bash on the festival's Web site. Organizers feel that Amherst will continue to be a good location, because it is between New York and Boston. Another reason is local interest. Judith Wobst, a Russian teacher at Amherst Regional High School, said Amherst has both strong middle and high school programs and that many local students go on to study Russian language and literature in the Five Colleges.

"[Amherst college professors] complain that Amherst High School students do all the talking in the classes," said Wobst.

Wobst said she is saddened that the University of Massachusetts Russian program could not be a part of the festival. "UMass killed its program, sadly," said Wobst.

The burning questions

Yousef Munayyer

Alex Arredondo grew up in Quincy, Massachusetts. Like many other Massachusetts natives his age, this August 24th he may have been watching the Red Sox or perhaps gearing up for the school year ahead. However, Alex was not near a diamond or a campus this August; he was spending the last moments of his life in Najaf, Iraq.

Private first class Alexander Arredondo was killed in combat only a few weeks ago. At 20 years old, he lost his life in the desert before he was old enough to buy a drink back home.

In Florida, three marines approached the residence of Carlos Arredondo, Alex's father. The marines, in formal uniform, were bearing news that no father ever wants to here.

In Carlos' eyes, however, they must have looked more like grim reapers than marines. It is hard to imagine what must have been going through his head when he beheld that site at his doorstep. Before the marines could even say a word to him, he surely already knew.

To say that Carlos Arredondo did not take the news well would be an understatement. With the marines at his doorstep, he silently went into his garage and returned with a propane tank, a gallon of gasoline and a welder's torch. The helpless and now distraught father climbed into the van that the marines had driven to his house. He proceeded to douse the interior of the van with gasoline and set it ablaze. This was his tragic attempt to end his now meaningless life. This was the scream that he did not let out on his doorstep.

Carlos Arredondo still outlives his son. The marines were able to get him out of the inferno that he created for himself. Though over half of his body was covered in severe burns, his wife stated that it looks like he will recover physically.

Luz Marina Arredondo, Alex's grandmother, felt the government was at fault for her grandson's death. She said, "They send them like guinea pigs over there."

There are over 1,000 stories like this. There are over 1,000 reactions to troubling news. There are over 1,000 visits which marines did not have to make.

Thousands of miles away, back in the deserts of Iraq, there are more deaths. Marines do not show up on the doorsteps in Iraq, though. The civilian deaths in Iraq are staggering. Perhaps these death stories total 10,000 or more. Yet there are no condolences that we hear of, no apologies for misguided JDAMs or errant apache fires on civilian crowds.

But apologies and message bearers never bring back the dead, they never right the wrong. The only progress we can make is to stop the killing before it continues. Lives hinge on our willingness to admit mistakes, yet pride continues to drill nails into coffins that will soon be covered in flags or forgotten in some desert town.

There was a time when civilians were not as affected by war. In the past, battles raged in open fields and in many cases, civilians congregated on surrounding hills to watch the outcome. With the coming of the last century, war was brought closer to home as the average person became more involved. Mobilization led to larger armies and fiercer battles. Battles came to cities, trenches were dug, bombs that evaporated the enemy were dropped, and huts filled with women and children were sprayed with automatic fire. After the Vietnam era, the ratio of military deaths to civilian deaths was 1:8. The people dying in the wars of today are not only the soldiers; in fact, most of those who die as a result of war have nothing to do with the war or politics at all. They are just there when it happens.

Lives hinge on our willingness to admit mistakes, yet pride continues to drill nails into coffins that will soon be covered in flags or forgotten in some desert town.

For this reason, the decision to go to war is more important today than it has ever been. If war is to be fought with the weapons of the new century, it must be decided with the wisdom of centuries past.

The people affected most by war today, whether they are the fathers in burning vans or mothers in the smoldering streets of Baghdad, have to be thought about before war commences. Foolish decisions are as unacceptable as unnecessary killings.

With every death, the magnitude of the mistake grows exponentially. The guinea pigs continue to die. Marines will continue to bear bad news on doorsteps. However, worst of all, grandmothers will continue to search for reasons why their hope for the future has gone up in smoke.

No cell phones in baseball

Dan McDonnell

I am a die-hard baseball fan. I've been watching the sport since I was a little kid. Being from the Boston area means I am, of course, a Red Sox fan. But I will watch any game played by any two teams at any time of the day. I even catch a few games here and there on ESPN Classic from the '70s and '80s.

Hundreds of little things have changed about the game over the last decade. Everyone that watches notices things like better hitters, harder-throwing pitchers, etc. Even the people in the crowd have changed. Nowadays you see more corporate suits in the front row and fewer devoted fans. It's a shame because this new influx of fans has led to the most annoying thing on television: the cell phone guy.

Every time I turn on a ballgame, I am forced to see some guy sitting in the third row on his cell phone waving like a madman to everyone out there watching TV. These guys sit down and instantly, their cell phone is attached to their ear to call absolutely every number in their phone book. Then, of course, as soon as they have someone on the other end, they feel the need to wave crazily.

It happens without fail every time I watch a baseball game. It doesn't matter if it's the Sox and the Yankees or the Expos and the Pirates. There's always someone on the phone waving to his or her friends at home watching the game. There must be an unwritten rule that a Major League Baseball game cannot be broadcast on television unless they are expected to have a minimum of three guys per inning on their cell phones calling their buddy Steve from behind home plate.

I am at a point where I just can't take it anymore. This is by far the most irritating thing on my TV today. I turned on a Sox game the other day and honest to God, there were five people standing up at the same time, phone in one hand attached to the ear with the other hand flailing about like they were all swatting at a swarm of bees. That one event officially brought me to my breaking point. I felt like Rocky Balboa in Rocky V when he finally snaps at the end and has the street fight with his former protégé, Tommy Gunn. I had been pushed over the edge.

There must be an unwritten rule that a Major League Baseball game cannot be broadcast on television unless they are expected to have a minimum of three guys per inning on their cell phones calling their buddy Steve from behind home plate.

Something needs to be done about the "cell phone guy," and it needs to be done soon. Do we really need to see someone waving to all his or her friends at every game on TV? I mean, we get it, you're on TV. Fabulous. We don't really care. Nobody needs to see you going crazy simply because you believe that you have "made it." Being on TV because you happened to be the fastest one to the seats that were formerly occupied by the not-so-big baseball fan who needed to leave early to beat traffic doesn't make you some kind of television star. It just makes you that "cell phone guy" who aggravates the hell out of everyone sitting at home trying to watch a game.

The ushers need to start regulating this new and downright bothersome phenomenon. Everyone sitting behind the plate in the region that will be seen on TV should be stripped of his or her cell phones. The ushers should just have a basket for cell phones. If you want to sit behind the plate, you are going to have to sacrifice the phone. If you need to make a call, then get out of your seat, walk down by the hot dog stand and dial whomever you want. Just please stop doing it on my television while I am trying to watch a game.

It's a simple request. From April through October, baseball is a big part of my daily routine. I don't like my routine being interrupted, especially by a guy distracting me from good, solid, athletic competition because his friend Tom might want to see him on TV. I don't come to your house and sidetrack you from eating your Cheerios and reading the morning paper. So please stop interfering in my daily habit of watching a ballgame. It's all I ask.

Dining halls deserve more credit

Stacy Kasdin

From elementary school through college, students have had one consistent complaint: cafeteria food. I've eaten at UCLA. I've eaten at Tufts. I'm not going to lie: I was jealous of their fresh fruit spread, and I wasn't thrilled about having to come back to UMass food. Known for such specialties as Trix pizza and cornflake macaroni and cheese, the UMass dining halls aren't exactly five-star quality. However, I came to the realization this summer that they are not getting nearly as much credit as they deserve.

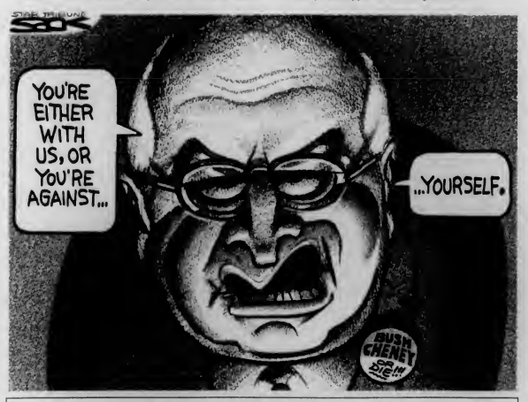
I spent the last 10 days before I returned to school on a cruise around the Hawaiian Islands with my parents. We were trying out a new cruise line, NCL America, which is a division of Norwegian Cruise Lines. The line was just starting up and had only been running for about two months. They were trying out a new system called freestyle dining, which means that instead of having an assigned mealtime, vacationers could choose to eat at one of two main restaurants, one of three specialty restaurants or at a buffet-style self-serve location. These were all available for four-hour intervals three times a day. Well, it seemed like a good idea.

The first night on the boat, the restaurants were not open. Quite a few people went to the two main restaurants, and the rest, including my family, went to the buffet. The line must have been made up of 150-200 people and grew by the second. We stood there without moving for a while, moved about a foot, and then continued to stand for some time again. In all, I think it took us about 30 minutes to get to the front of the line, at which point I discovered that the main course offerings consisted of hamburgers, hotdogs and ribs. I don't eat red meat. My long-awaited meal consisted of half a cold corn on the cob and a cheese and pickle sandwich.

As much as we may complain about the food offered here, we really do have a decent selection, and we can get our food quickly and be on our way.

The buffet system was very similar to that of the dining halls on campus. You come in, get your tray and stand in line. You take your food and go find a seat. I've never stood in a line in the dining hall for more than five minutes. Maybe 10 minutes on lobster night.

I'm not sure exactly what the problem was on the boat, but the lines moved beyond sluggishly, and the potato product and cold fish I ended up getting for just about every lunch and dinner really wasn't worth the wait. It got to the point where my father, a diabetic, was eating dessert nearly every night and taking extra insulin because there just wasn't anything else to eat.



I've done my fair share of complaining about the dining hall food, but they always have a sandwich bar, a pasta bar, a waffle maker and salad. They also always have a vegetarian option. Furthermore, the cost of my one-year school meal plan was substantially less than the cost of this cruise. At one point, I had a discussion with the cruise director about implementing a system similar to UMass' grab-n-go on the boat. When in port we would leave the boat for excursions, and if we didn't get up two hours early, we wouldn't be able to get breakfast before we left. If they had packs of cereal, pastries, bagels, coffee, etc. available, it would have been very convenient.

The director sort of shrugged me off, saying that some of the longer excursions provided meals for their guests. I don't know about the other dining halls, but I know Worcester hangs their student comment cards on a bulletin board near the entrance and tries to take all suggestions into account. A similarity between the dining halls on campus and the cruise was that they both offered ice cream every day. The difference? The dining halls offer soft-serve and hard ice cream pretty much from the middle of breakfast until the end of dinner. The boat offered it from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m., but ran out every day around 4 p.m.

Eventually, the main and specialty restaurants opened, and people stood outside waiting for anywhere between one and three hours for a table, whether or not they had reservations, and then waited about an hour at their table to get their food. At the specialty restaurants, they were paying as much as $15 extra per person for this poor service. My family and I heard this and decided not even to bother, because as bad as the buffet was, three hours was a lot more than the 30 minutes to an hour it took to get through the buffet. Luckily, about halfway through the cruise, we began traveling at night and people were too nauseous to eat, which provided a bit more restaurant space. We ate at one of the main restaurants on our last night on the boat. It was certainly nothing special.

By the fourth or fifth day on the boat, I was proudly telling people that I was a college student and was very much looking forward to returning to my school's dining hall food. As much as we may complain about the food offered here, we really do have a decent selection, and we can get our food quickly and be on our way. That cruise has given me a newfound appreciation for such delicacies as Trix pizza and cornflake macaroni and cheese. The Trix pizza is hot, the macaroni and cheese vegetarian and the ice cream plentiful. For that, I am eternally thankful.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

IN KERRY'S DEFENSE

In their editorials on Sept. 17, Collegian columnists Johnny Donaldson and Stephen Post both offered strong indictments of the Bush administration (with which I heartily agree). Yet both found it hard to muster any real enthusiasm for his opponent, John Kerry. Donaldson, after describing his ideal candidate, concluded, "I don't know if Kerry is that guy, but Bush definitely is not." Meanwhile, Post fueled the fires of voter apathy by warning that there is little to differentiate Kerry from Bush. These are hardly ringing endorsements of this year's Democratic candidate.

In fact, there is plenty to differentiate Kerry from Bush. Let me offer just a couple of examples why I believe Kerry may, indeed, be "that guy" who can lead our country in a better direction.

Donaldson mentioned his concern for environmental protection; it would be hard to find two candidates more strongly "differentiated" than Bush and Kerry when it comes to environmental issues. The non-partisan League of Conservation Voters puts John Kerry's lifetime, pro-environment voting record at a whopping 97 percent, one of the highest in the Senate. (As a standard of comparison, Al Gore only scored 68 percent when he was in the Senate.) President Bush, on the other hand, is the first President in 34 years to earn a grade of "F" from the League.

Donaldson also mentioned his concern for the rights of gay Americans. Here again, there is a clear choice. In 1996, John Kerry was one of only 14 Senators who voted in opposition to the anti-gay "Defense of Marriage" Act. President Bush, on the other hand, advocates elevating that piece of discriminatory legislation to the level of a Constitutional Amendment.

Perhaps neither candidate fully matches our picture of the ideal leader, but a vote is not a statement of ideals. It is an ACTION by which the next President of our country will be determined. On Election Day, my own course of action will be clear.

THANKS FOR FIRST WEEK SUCCESS

The Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life would like to extend a hearty thank you to the UMass Amherst student body for your participation and collaboration with First Week activities. The return of the spirit, energy and passion that only students can exhibit on our campus was a welcomed site.

First Week 2004 was a critical success due to the joined forces and enthusiasm of the many offices and volunteers that gave of their time and energy long before the week started. I personally want to extend my deep gratitude to all those individuals and offices from Academic Affairs, Administration and Finance, Alumni Relations, University Advancement and Student Affairs and Campus Life for your early morning, late night and everything in between assistance and for putting into action our STUDENTS FIRST philosophy. I encourage the campus community to perpetuate the good feeling and rousing school spirit that was created throughout the academic year.

Thanks and GO UMASS!

Old 97's lead singer Rhett Miller will invade the Pearl Street night club tonight with his band's version of what has been branded alternative country.

Old 97's: A new kind of country

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Correspondent

The Old 97's will be playing at the Pearl Street Night Club tonight in support of their new album, "Drag it Up."

The band was formed in Dallas, Texas by singer Rhett Miller and guitarist/bassist guitarist Murray Hammond. The remainder of the band is made up of guitarist Ken Bethea and drummer Phil Peeples.

Their first album, "Wreck Your Life," was released in 1995. The bands popularity began to rise soon there after, with the success of future albums such as "Fight Songs" and "Satellite Rides."

Some of their most well known songs "Victoria", "Nineteen" and "Question," are good examples of the bands sound, that is best described as alternative country. The Old 97's fall in to the same category as such success stories as Wilco and Whiskeytown.

Whiskeytown's tempermental, former lead singer Ryan Adams has since gone solo and is also a great artist to listen to for those who enjoy the Old 97's. Adams, who has been hailed by the likes of Rolling Stone Magazine and British rock legend Elton John, has become a staple in this genre of music. He is also rumored to have stormed off stage once during a live performance after concert patrons insisted, he perform songs by the like-named artist Bryan Adams.

The Old 97's 2004 release "Drag it Up" is a solid, although not quite as good as some of their previous efforts. The reviews for the album have been a little underwhelming. Rolling Stone played on the album title by referring to it as "kind of a drag."

Part of the problem with the album is that a few of the songs have lost some of their charm through the recording process. "Won't be Home," was a fantastic simple song, when performed live, but on the album it seems as if something has been lost in the translation.

That is not to say that the album is sub par. It still features a handful of great songs such as "Bloomington." If it weren't for the band's success with their other discs, perhaps this disk could also be considered great.

Lead singer Miller is also known for his 2002 solo effort, "The Instigator." That album featured 12 well-written and clever songs including the single "Come Around," which received moderate radio airplay. "The Instigator," sounds as if it is an Old 97's album in which only Miller's work was actually recorded. Although it is a fine album, it is not enough of a departure from Miller's previous work to warrant a solo album.

Those interested in Old 97's music should check out their 2001 release "Satellite Rides," though hardcore fans tend to gravitate towards their 1997 release, "Too tough to Care", which featured the great song "Barrier Reef."

Today

"Satellite Rides" is their most accessible album, even though it is a bit of a departure from previous albums, in that it is not as strongly influenced by country music. Interesting enough for this Texas foursome, it sounds much more like a Brit-rock album. The album features some fantastic and witty songs such as the aforementioned "Question," "King of all of the World," and a personal favorite, "Rollerskate Skinny."

Certain editions of "Satellite Rides" feature a bonus disk that has five recordings of older songs that do a good job in summing up where the Old 97's have been and what they're capable of. This album comes highly recommended and is a great starter album for anyone who wants to get into the Old 97's.

Opening for the Old 97's tonight is Chuck Prophet. This alternative country guitarist is supporting his recent album "Turn the Pigeons Loose," which is his 8th solo album. Before turning solo Prophet was in an alt-country band Green on Red.

The show begins at seven and tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.

'Dar' becomes hometown staple

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Northampton – For Dar Williams Friday's performance at the Calvin Theater marked a significant homecoming: she was back and better than ever.

Williams, a former resident of Northampton, defected to New York City recently, after spending much of her early thirties and a significant chunk of her time as a songwriter in the Pioneer Valley. Though her sound has changed since the move, Friday's performance saw Northampton's favorite daughter all the better for the change of scenery. Not only has her talent and strength as a songwriter grown considerably, but Dar has also begun an odyssey into the world of book writing as well.

From the moment the quirky, blond singer/songwriter took the stage, she held her audience captive under a spell woven from her melodic voice and delicate acoustic arrangements. For an hour and a half she played a well-rounded assortment of old and new songs and in the tradition of VH1's "Storytellers" took time to tell a little bit about most of her songs. Williams' one-woman show gave both seasoned fans and those who had never heard her music before a chance to get to know the performer and form an attachment to the songs.

A new mother herself, Dar began her show with the silly yet moving tribute to caregivers everywhere called, "The Babysitter's Here." "She's the best one that we've ever had/She sits on her hair, and she's tall as my dad/ And she tie-dyed my shirt, and she pierced her own ear/ And it's peace, man, cool, yeah, the babysitter's here," she sang in the refrain. As the song went on, however, it gained some depth. "But it's Saturday night, I can't sleep, and we're watching the news/ She says, 'Do me a favor, don't go with a guy who would make you choose,' " she sang with the innocence and curiosity of a child as a deeper story about the babysitter herself unfolds.

Also on the roster were fan-favorites "Christians and Pagans" and "When I Was a Boy," songs about acceptance and the absurdity of gender roles, respectively. "Are You Out There," a less folk and more rock-folk song, and "The End of Summer," a timely ballad, rounded out the set.

The highlight of the phenomenal show was probably "The Beauty of the Rain," the title track off Williams' most recent studio album. With the help of Dar's voice, the bittersweet song was moving, and the crowd was completely enchanted by her graceful and elegant guitar playing.

Williams also played a couple of new tunes for the generously sized crowd: one she had written in Northampton a long time ago and another she hadn't quite finished. In spite of not being finished, the song that Dar explained as a sort of exploration of her dedication to religion as a child in a house of atheists ("I used to go free-lance to Sunday school," she joked) was impressive. If this is the quality of music Williams will be delivering in the future, then fans both old and new certainly have a lot to look forward to.

'Mr. 3000' swings but misses

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

It has finally happened. If people weren't bothered by the fact that comedian Bernie Mac stars in his own family sitcom, viewers must surely be grossed out by the direction that Mac's movies are taking. Wholesome and fuzzy, "Mr. 3000" just doesn't cut it.

Not to be rude, but didn't Bernie Mac's comedic performances have guts before? Not that "Mr. 3000" wasn't humorous (cough sell-out cough). But if this were 15 years ago, Bill Cosby would have played this role with more efficiency. There are two types of comedians in this world: ones that do standup and ones that do television. Historically, with a few minor exceptions (Larry David, Ray Romano and Andy Kaufman), when a comedian begins television and movies, much of their heart is lost in the transition.

The point is Bernie Mac grew up in inner city Chicago. Fans historically have enjoyed the fact that he is raw. In "The Kings of Comedy" Mac was in his prime. He was reminiscent of great comedians of the past like Richard Pryor. He rivaled peers like Chris Rock and D.L. Hughley. He was on top of the game because his comedy, despite being crude and at times offensive, was real. It was unique in the sense that it drew in a whole new audience to comedy.

'Mr. 3000'
Directed by Charles Stone III
Starring Bernie Mac, Angela Bassett
Touchstone Pictures
104 mins.
Grade D

Since then Mac has starred in major blockbuster hits like "Mo' Money," "Ocean's Eleven," and the 1996 Spike Lee movie "Get on the Bus." He even had his own HBO comedy special named "Midnight Mac."

In "Mr. 3000" it is almost laughable to consider that Mac actually chose this role because he thought he would be the best actor to play it. Honestly, it may not be far-fetched that the former "King of Comedy" may be making his royal decisions based on what will garner a larger paycheck. The ironic part is, the character Mac plays in the film is branded a sell-out and Mac makes this role seem far too autobiographical.

In "Mr. 3000," Mac plays the fictional, self-centered, Milwaukee Brewers superstar baseball player, Stan Ross. Ross was once a gifted player who decided to quit the game at his prime after he achieved his 3000th hit. Ross leaves his team while they are in the heat of a playoff race because he believes the milestone would surely grant him a spot in the Baseball Hall of Fame.

Nine years later, Ross is the proprietor of a plaza of stores named for his major achievement. He owns 3000 Woks, a Chinese food restaurant; 3000 Paws, a dog grooming shop; and even a pub named Mr. 3000's Sports Bar that has 3000 different types of beer. The only catch is, the fact-checking commission in charge of reviewing possible Hall of Fame candidates finds out

Doherty ignites Fox's 'North Shore'

By Daniel Fineberg
Zap2it.com

On Aug. 8, "North Shore" was a Fox summer soap trying desperately to find enough of an audience to stay afloat. On Aug. 9, Fox revealed that former "Beverly Hills, 90210" teen queen Shannen Doherty was joining the cast for at least three episodes with the possibility of a longer run.

Just like magic, on Aug. 13 Fox announced that "North Shore" was getting a back-nine pick-up, the ultimate vote of confidence for a show whose fan base is devoted, if tiny.

Nobody is explicitly saying that "North Shore" is sticking around because of Doherty – in fact, executive producer Bert Salke insists it was coming either way – but even in discussions about the part, the actress knew what might be at stake.

"I think it had been casually mentioned to me," Doherty laughs.

The natural instinct, particularly if you're a wildly optimistic Fox executive, is to compare Doherty's arrival on "North Shore" to the moment Heather Locklear moved into "Melrose Place" and transformed what was a sluggish "90210" spin-off into a brilliantly trashy institution. Certainly there appears to be some similarly bitchy DNA shared between Locklear's fiery Amanda Woodward and Doherty's, Alexandra Hudson.

"We wanted what we sometimes call an 'engine' on these shows, to not only give an expected ratings jump and bringing more viewers to a show that has momentum, but also that is something that a story spins off on," Salke says. "She was just the perfect [character] for people to spin around.

On Monday, Alexandra arrives on the North Shore to surprise everybody with the revelation that she's Walter Booth's [Christopher McDonald] daughter and therefore Nicole's [Brooke Burns] sister. One can only imagine that this deeply buried secret will set off a few fireworks. But is Doherty comfortable with assuming the Locklear mantle as show-saver?

"No, I'm not. It's a huge amount of pressure," Doherty says nervously. "Heather Locklear is amazing and what she does for shows is terrific and it's big footsteps to follow in. I'm very comfortable with the fact that I have an amazing fan base that is just so loyal."

Although Salke and fellow showrunner Chris Brancato were aware of Doherty's reputation for being occasionally difficult, he praises Doherty's professionalism and says that the only concern was the delicate ecosystem of a new show.

"Chris and I have done a lot of shows and we learned long ago not to judge somebody on what you hear, but on what you know," he says. "Frankly the fear is not about somebody's reputation, but the fact of a 'star' coming on to a show that's getting its legs, where a group of people have been together, somewhat clustered in Hawaii, for four months and you add someone new who's probably a big personality to that dynamic. That's the fear."

The experiment seems to be working so far. In addition to snagging its back-nine order, "North Shore" has already signed Doherty for three additional episodes, bringing her run to six and counting.

"I don't think they looked at it like me being a savior and I certainly don't look at it that way," she says.

How long Doherty will stay with the series remains open and having already left two successful shows in the midst of their runs, she acknowledges that she finds the TV schedule "a grind." She may ultimately leave that choice to others.

COURTESY OF 90210.COM

Former Beverly Hills, 90210 star Shannen Doherty is hoping to breathe new life in to the ailing Fox show 'North Shore.'

Mac strikes out

that due to a recording error, Ross' totals were incorrect. He really only achieved 2997 total hits, but 3 hits were recorded twice.

Ross has built his entire reputation on this number. It is his legacy. He goes through a short period of confusion, but he decides that he has no other choice but to make a return to the game of baseball at age 47. It's a good thing this plot isn't far-fetched. That would make this hard to believe. Note the sarcasm.

Through it all, Mac played the same type of character that he has been playing on Fox's Bernie Mac Show. He is sly, witty, yet at times the lovable jerk. He prides himself on his past achievements and really can't let go of his past.

Directed by Charles Stone III ("Drumline," "Paid in Full"), "Mr. 3000" falls in with a long line of feel-good baseball movies. There are many funny moments that provoke a giggle or two, but be sure, there will be no Oscar nominations or teenage following for this film. There is an overall cute bubble that makes the movie far too safe for the average Bernie Mac fan.

A shining note in the film was the role of Mo, played by Angela Bassett. Though a wretched makeup job made her look old in the film, Bassett shined in her role as Ross' love interest. She is quick, intelligent and tough, as she is in nearly every role she has had in her career. With her well-rounded talent, Bassett quite possibly could be one of America's most underrated actresses.

Another interesting note of the film was the seditious commentary on what the commercialization of professional sports has done to the ego of the player. One thing "Mr. 3000" does accurately is point out what has happened to America's favorite pastime. The video game generation has helped to turn what used to be a game about talent and pride into a contest of egos.

"Mr. 3000" did something that not many movies are able to do. It is pretty funny yet not so funny for Mac. It has great acting yet not so great acting from Mac, who is the star of the film. It had an interesting plotline, but Bernie Mac could have done better. Maybe next time he could star in a movie about a parent and a child who magically switch bodies; that hasn't been done yet. Note more sarcasm.

Quality In Everything We Do

Belichick quoted in 'Patriot Reign'

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Bill Belichick and Bill Parcells can agree on one thing: A book that dredges up the stormiest part of their relationship is old news.

"I don't have anything to say about it," Parcells said at the Cowboys' practice facility in Irving, Texas, on Monday. "Gosh almighty, how many years ago was that?"

The book, "Patriot Reign: Bill Belichick, the Coaches, and the Players Who Built a Champion," by former Boston Globe sports writer Michael Holley, is more about the inner workings of the Patriots. But the most explosive details could be those that pertain to Parcells' departure from New England following the 1997 Super Bowl.

The Patriots lost that one to the Green Bay Packers; Parcells did not fly back to New England with the team, and he was working for the Jets soon after. According to a review of the book on SI.com, Belichick said Parcells' behavior was a distraction as the team prepared to play for the NFL title.

"Yeah, I'd say it was a little bit of a distraction all the way around. I can tell you first-hand, there was a lot of stuff going on prior to the game. I mean, him talking to other teams. He was trying to make up his mind about what he was going to do. Which, honestly, I felt was totally inappropriate," Belichick said, according to SI.com.

"How many chances do you get to play for the Super Bowl? Tell them to get back to you in a couple of days. I'm not saying it was disrespectful to me, but it was in terms of the overall commitment to the team."

The book also reports that there were "dozens" of calls made from Parcells' hotel room at the Super Bowl to Hempstead, N.Y., where the Jets have their headquarters, according to SI.com. Attempts to obtain comment from the book's publisher, William Morrow, were unsuccessful.

In his weekly briefing with reporters on Monday, Belichick downplayed the book, noting that many of the allegations had been previously reported. The claim that telephone records prove contact between Parcells and the Jets before the Super Bowl was reported at the time, though the records have never been produced publicly.

"I'm not part of hyping the book. I'm not on that hype program," Belichick said. "It's old news. All that stuff was talked about. I can't tell you how many Bill Parcells questions and stories there were last year in the Dallas game and all that. I'm trying to concentrate on this season."

US Ryder Cup team down and out

while he has never had a winning record in any of the four Ryder Cup matches he has played.

Maybe the Americans simply care too much.

For anyone to suggest they don't get as excited as Europe about the Ryder Cup is to ignore what happened on the 12th green Sunday at Oakland Hills. In a singles match he already was winning handily, Woods watched his 35-foot eagle putt track to the hole, then removed his cap and thrust it toward the crowd when it disappeared.

It was the most emotion he has shown all year. But he and the rest of the Americans were wound so tight at the start of this Ryder Cup that it took five shots on the opening hole of the better-ball matches before someone (Stewart Cink) found the fairway.

Hal Sutton made some curious decisions as the U.S. captain, although the nine-point loss will spare him much of the second-guessing that follows any Ryder Cup.

Sure, the Woods-Phil Mickelson pairing was a bust and gave Europe early momentum. But who could have guessed David Toms and Jim Furyk would lose in the first session? And who thought Jay Haas and Chris DiMarco would be the Americans' best alternate-shot pairing?

Sutton made some keen observations after his team fell five points behind after the first day. During the eight hours he spent on the course Friday, he saw the Americans gritting their teeth and Europeans smiling.

"It looked like they were trying to make something happen," Sutton said. "And it looked like we were trying to make sure we didn't have anything bad happen."

defense wins championships and the George Washington Colonials hope to ride their phenomenal defense straight to an A-10 title. The Colonial's "D" is anchored by senior backs Lindsay Bruno and Kelly Lawton. Lawton and Bruno, a preseason A-10 Conference team member, were the essential parts of a defense that allowed just 0.87 goals per game last year. Junior Michelle Miller and sophomores Nicole Cavino and Shari Taylor will all help fortify the defense. Anna Handzlik will take over as the fulltime goalkeeper. The transfer from the University of Colorado enjoyed a solid first season with the Colonials in 2003 posting a 0.89 GAA and led the league in saves per game with 6.43. On the offensive end, George Washington will need one or several players to step up and replace the play-making ability of graduated forward Kim Warner.

Sophomore Sarah Sample, a member of the 2003 A-10 All-Rookie team, looks to be ready for the challenge. After contributing 11 points last season, Sample has already put up five points (2 G, 1A) (that doesn't add up—ed.) so far this season. Aiding her on the offensive end will be junior midfielders, Ina Kain and Ashley Squires, and junior forward, Lise Beckman. Also, keep an eye on rookie forward Kiki Colker, a prized recruit who scored the game-winning goal against South Dakota State.

Duquesne University
2003 Record 8-10-2 (4-6-1 in A-10)
Current Record: 4-4 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach: James Walker (2nd Year)

After a difficult 2003 season, The Duquesne Dukes are hoping to bounce back strong in 2004. The Dukes will bring back seven starters from the 2003 squad including seniors Erica Carey and Katie Schwager. Coach Walker will need the duo to provide both leadership and scoring after leading scorer and All-Conference midfielder Lauren Bracco's having graduated. Freshman midfielder Audra Matthews has had a strong start to her college career. The pre-season A-10 Rookie team member leads the team in both goals (five) and assists (five). Another pleasant surprise has been freshman Fay Rasmussen. The rookie has started all seven games and has tallied three goals so far this year.

The Duke's "D" will continue to be a strong point for the team as it returns four starters from last year's squad: senior Caitlin Holmes, junior Katie McCarter and sophomores Jessica Legge and Elizabeth Bok. The Dukes will need this group to pick up from where they left off last year, only allowing 1.55 goals per game. Virginia Bondi will be in net for Duquesne this season. Bondi won the job after splitting time with Rachel Gecik in 2003, but has struggled in the early goings allowing more than three goals per outing.

St. Bonaventure University
2003 Record: 5-13-1 (3-7-1 in A-10)
Current Record: 6-2 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach: Dan Magner (3rd Season)

It's been relatively smooth sailing for the Bonnies this year after a disappointing 2003 campaign. St. Bonaventure is 4-1 in its last 5 games including wins of 5-0 and 8-0 against Niagara and St. Peters respectively. The Bonnies will rely mainly on its 11 juniors for success this year as only one senior, Cheryl Benacci, returns to the team for the 2004 season. The Bonnie defense, for example, will be composed of four juniors: Katie Fredlund, Lois Bennett, Alyssa Castranova and Emily Kridler, all of whom saw significant time as sophomores. St. Bonaventure hopes the quartet has learned from last season and will give up less than the 44 goals allowed last year. For offense, the Bonnies have been stellar, averaging more than three goals per game.

Leading the charge has been sophomore forward Kerry O'Malley. The ultimate playmaker, O'Malley has scored nine goals already this season while setting up her teammates for another eight. Nipping right on her heels is Heather MacDougal. The junior forward has eight goals including four against St. Peter's and was named A-10 Player of the Week on September 14th. Jackie Parmiter, a freshman, is also making her presence known. She is third on the team in scoring with three goals and four assists.

La Salle University
2003 Record: 3-13-1 (3-8-0 in A-10)
Current Record: 2-1-2 (1-0-0 A-10)
Coach: Paul Royal (2nd year)

The La Salle Explorers are looking to return to the A-10 tournament after not qualifying for the first time in three years in 2003. Leading the way for offense will be junior Alexis Petrucci and sophomore Heather Barclay. Both have four goals and an assist.

Barclay did the bulk of her scoring against A-10 foe Fordham as she posted her first career hat trick. For her efforts she was named A-10 player of the week. The defense will be led by senior Liz Ash, junior Erin McNulty and freshman Jenna Guagenti. Senior Kerry Schamberger has been tremendous in front of the net this year. So far she's posted a 0.65 GAA with 23 saves and two shutouts in six games this season.

Temple University
2003 Record: 4-14-1 (2-9-0 in A-10)
Current Record: 2-3 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach: David Jones (1st Season)

The good news is that the Temple Owls will probably improve in the A-10 standings this season. The bad news is that Temple finished a league worst 2-9 in 2003. Coach Jones will look to twins Samantha and Stephanie Vietry to drive this year's offense. The sophomore duo combined for 12 goals last year, and this year they share the team lead for goals with two a piece. Aiding the twins on the offensive end will be senior midfielder Melissa Foley and sophomore Kelly Lare.

On the defensive end, captain Courtney Eaton will be in charge of leading the Owl's backs. Eaton will be joined by juniors Trish Dalton and Jackie Conn. Dalton has been a starter since her freshman year and can also provide some offense for Temple. Handling the goal keeping responsibilities will be 2003 team MVP Jackie Mauro. The senior stopped 109 shots last season while recording a 2.47 GAA and two shutouts.

UMass to face Blue Devils

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team will head to New Britain, Conn. tomorrow ready to face a world of difficulty.

Sporting a roster that includes three players from Canadian, four from Great Britain and one from Sweden, the Central Connecticut State Blue Devils (4-3) are coming off a convincing 4-0 defeat of the Oregon Ducks, and will be looking to add to their win column with their different style of play.

"They don't knock it around a whole lot," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "It's a very English style, very straightforward. It's up, back and over, or up, square and through. They're fairly direct, and they tackle very hard, too."

So, how effective is the imported style on the field? CCSU's top three scorers have scored a combined nine goals for 25 points through seven games in 2004. The Minutewomen (0-5) have scored just three goals all season long, all three coming from freshmen.

Topping the stat sheet for the Blue Devils is the dangerous sophomore midfield/forward Jess McCavanagh, who has four goals and five assists for 13 points on the year. With numbers like that, you can be sure Rudy will be eyeing the Massapequa, N.Y. native like a hawk.

"I think with McCavanagh, you just got to keep in mind where she is at all times," Rudy said. "She tends to ghost out on the left flank, and [the Blue Devils] will take advantage of that."

Another real threat comes from the European side of the Blue Devils' diverse offense in Swedish-born Marina Lorentzson and England's own Sophie Hooper. While they won't turn any heads with the numbers they put up (a combined one goal and one assist for three points,) it is their setups that have directed the Blue Devils to some great scoring opportunities all year long.

"McCavanagh's great, but I think the real danger in this thing is the impact of Lorentzson and Hooper," Rudy said. "They are real big in the air. They win about every air ball there is, and I can't say we're great in the air. We're getting better, though."

But the role of spoiler is a position the Maroon and White have been playing all year. With all the hard work that's been going into their practices, and all the scoring opportunities that have gone wide, the feeling is that something may break soon. Today would be a perfect opportunity.

"If we do win tomorrow, I think it's going to make a whole different season for us," senior Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather said.

With the season-ending injuries to seniors Erica Wideburg and Carly Turman now official, she remains the lone senior guiding along an attack that includes Adair Blyler, Lindsey Bellini and freshman Britt Canfield.

"We've got to go out there and play like we have been," Fairweather added. "Maybe we could score some more, that would be nice. Coach has been trying to tell us to keep our spirits up, not get ourselves down."

But if the Minutewomen are to keep pace tomorrow, they will have to start making some shots. As a team, they are converting just over 14 percent of their shots into goals.

"I don't think our tactics are the problem, as far as our positions on the field are and everything," Fairweather said. "It's just our focus when we get into that final third of the field. We're always two feet away from the post, or not coming close enough."

Junior Lindsey Bellini dribbles the ball during the 2003 campaign. Bellini has a goal and an assist on the season for the Minutewomen.

Excuses follow USA's defeat

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

BLOOMFIELD TOWNSHIP, Mich. (AP) — The Americans have run out of explanations, but not excuses.

It should no longer be a mystery — nor an upset, for that matter — when the Europeans go home with the Ryder Cup, because that's what they have done seven out of the last 10 matches. Just never like this.

For the first time, Europe won every format over three days at Oakland Hills — alternate shot (4 1/2-3 1/2), better ball (6 1/2-1 1/2) and singles (7 1/2-4 1/2) — and wound up handing the Americans their worst loss (18 1/2-9 1/2) since this friendly little exhibition began in 1927.

The United States was gracious in defeat until someone mentioned the Presidents Cup.

"It's harder on us, playing it every year," Davis Love III said.

"It does take a lot out of you," Tiger Woods added. "As the Europeans said, if they had to do this every year, it would be very difficult."

Funny, but that's what the Americans said in 1998 after getting drubbed Down Under at the Presidents Cup. It has become a convenient excuse for them to complain about playing in these team events every year — against Europe in the Ryder Cup, then against everyone but Europe in the Presidents Cup. And maybe there is some truth to that.

The arrival of the Presidents Cup coincided with the Americans' slump in the Ryder Cup; they are 1-4 since 1994. Against a stronger International team, they are 3-1-1 in the Presidents Cup. They can handle Vijay Singh, Ernie Els, Mike Weir and Retief Goosen, four of the top seven players in the world with nine major championships among them. They get badly beaten by Lee Westwood and Sergio Garcia.

Does anyone really think doing away with the Presidents Cup will help the Americans in the Ryder Cup? If anything, they should see the Presidents Cup as a solution. It is more like a working vacation. The Americans are far more relaxed, and it brings out the best in their golf.

Woods is 8-7-0 in the Presidents Cup,

Atlantic 10, a talented group in 2004

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

University of Dayton
2003 Record: 12-5-2 (8-1 in A-10)
Current Record: 6-1 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach: Mike Tucker (10th Season)

The Dayton Flyers have dominated the A-10 in recent years, finishing atop the league standings the last six seasons to go along with league titles in 1999, 2001, and 2003. It should come as no surprise that the Flyers have been picked to win the conference once again by the A-10 Coaches' Association. Leading the way this year will be senior midfielder Tesia Kozlowski and junior forward Reba Sedlacek, members of the 2003 Atlantic 10 first and second teams respectively. Sarah West, a sophomore goalkeeper, will also be key to Dayton's success. As a freshman, West posted four shutouts and a league leading .844 save percentage. Seniors Jen Samonetti and Leah Phelps, along with junior Jacqueline Luehers, will help anchor Dayton's stellar defense that allowed less than one goal per game.

Fordham University
2003 Record: 11-5-2 (7-2-2 in A-10)
Current Record: 4-1 (0-1-0 A-10)
Coach: Ness Salmani (9th Season)

After a very successful 2003 campaign, Coach Ness Salmani hopes that 2004 will bring similar fortune. Salmani, last year's A-10 Coach of the Year, returns six seniors to this year's squad, including defender Corey Dunfey. Dunfey, a member of the 2003 All-Atlantic 10 team, had six goals and eight assists last season and has notched two assists thus far this year. Joining Dunfey in the backfield are junior Lindsey Glode and freshman Laura Muzzatti. Muzzatti, a highly touted recruit, was named to the 2004 preseason All-Rookie team. On the offensive end, senior forward Beth Purcell has played well, tallying a goal and two assists in five games this season.

University of Richmond
2003 Record: 11-9-2 (7-3-0 in A-10)
Current Record: 2-3-1 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach: Peter Albright (9th season)

With eight returning starters from last year's third-place squad, the Richmond Spiders will be a force to be reckoned with this year. If their record seems a little sub-par, it's only because the Spiders have had a rigorous non-conference schedule including Clemson (ranked ninth) as well as Oregon State and James Madison, both of which have received votes in national Top 25 polls. The highlight of the Spider's non-conference season however, has been the upset of No. 7 Tennessee Volunteers on September 16th. Seniors Whitey Sikes and Meghan Ogilvie have provided the majority of the offense this year, combining for three of the team's four goals.

Sophomore Brooke Binswanger will also play a major role in the offense. Richmond's leading scorer last year, Binswanger was named to this year's pre-season All-Conference team. Dani Amarant, a sophomore, who was also named to the pre-season All-Conference squad as well, will guide the defense. Megan Cox will handle the goalkeeping duties. Cox was very solid in the net last season posting a 1.20 GAA (goals against average), with seven shutouts. Her performance landed her a slot on the 2003 All-Conference team.

Xavier University
2003 Record: 11-7-1 (7-4 in A-10)
Current Record: 1-7 (0-0-0 A-10)
Head Coach: Ron Quinn (12th Year)

The Xavier Musketeers have struggled out of the gate this year despite eight returning starters from the 2003 team. This year's squad will be led by senior tri-captains Melissa Clavier, Andrea Garber and Nicole Giesting. Giesting's sister, Lauren, will be the focal point of this year's offense.

A second team All-Conference member, Lauren Giesting leads the team with two goals. Xavier can also expect some offense from sophomore Amber Silvis (2003 All Rookie team) and freshmen Jillian Chuck and Kristin Martini. For defense, the Musketeers will look to Clavier as well as juniors Laura Merkel and Kristen Ruehlmann. Garber will return as goalkeeper this year. The senior should return to 2003 form in which she posted a 1.43 GAA as well as six shutouts despite struggling early this season.

St Joseph's University
2003 Record: 9-7-1 (7-4-0 in A-10)
Current Record: 2-5 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach: Jess Reynolds (4th Season)

Despite their 1-3 record, the St. Joseph's Hawks should be right in the thick of things this year, losing only one starter from last year's squad. Last year's A-10 Rookie of the Year, Megan Schutt, will be the team's offensive catalyst. In 2003, she scored 11 goals and dished out five assists, setting the Hawk freshman scoring record with 27 points.

Sophomores Ali Wean and Nancy Cook will add to the Hawk's offensive punch. Cook was an A-10 All-Rookie team selection in 2003 and Wean is in her first year at St Joseph's after transferring from Florida State. Sophomore Kimmy Leigh and senior Marisa Barrier will be the featured midfielders and will be key to the team's success.

Co-captains Jen Harris and Alisha Paine, who will provide leadership and tenacity to this young squad, will control the defense. Freshman Jen Khun beat out incumbent Nicole Dienna for the starting goalkeeper slot. So far the freshman has responded well with a 1.60 GAA and one shutout in six games. She also posted 10 saves against No. 22 Villanova.

University Of Rhode Island
2003 Record: 8-8-2 (6-4-1 in A-10)
Current Record: 4-4 (1-0-0 A-10)
Coach: Lisa Cole (2nd year)

At first glance, the Rhode Island Rams look to be struggling in the first part of their season. What the record doesn't tell you, though, is that the Rams have had the toughest non-conference schedule of any A-10 team. Rhody has faced two nationally ranked squads in Santa Clara and Arizona State as well as highly regarded programs such as Michigan State, Southern California, and James Madison.

Don't be fooled, the Rams will be in contention for this year's A-10 title. URI will look for the Kasparek Twins, Melanie and Megan, to lead the way. Melanie, the 2003 A-10 Offensive Player of the Year, has lead the league in scoring over the past two years and has one goal already this year.

Megan was also productive last season with three goals and four assists. This year she leads the team in scoring with three goals and one assist. Also be on the look out for freshman Debni Nelson. Nelson posted two goals and an assist against UMass. Coach Lisa Cole thinks Nelson can be a major contributor if she finishes her shots more consistently like she did against the Minutewomen. The Rams will be chock full of experience on defense as all four starters from the 2003 squad (Molly Parkhurst with juniors Molly Bergren, Laura Gothberg and Kelly McTurk) return for the 2004 season. Ria Carroll, a transfer from Pace University in New York, will take over as the goalkeeper. Carroll currently has a 1.30 GAA with two shutouts.

George Washington
2003 Record: 11-6-2 (5-5-1 in A-10)
Current Record: 2-2-2 (0-0-0 A-10)
Coach Tanya Vogel (5th Season)

There's an old adage that

Duquesne junior midfielder Jennifer LaCava has three shots on goal this year for the Dukes and adds depth to an already potent offense.

Sunwheel viewing begins for Autumnal Equinox

COURTESY SUNWHEEL

Students and faculty can view the sunrise and sunset at the UMass Sunwheel on Sept. 22-23.

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Students and faculty are invited to view the sunrise and sunset of the Autumnal Equinox at the University of Massachusetts Sunwheel on September 22 and 23.

Doctor Judith Young, a member of the Astronomy department is the one responsible for having a Sunwheel erected at UMass.

According to the Young's Sunwheel information site, a Sunwheel is a type of solar calendar made up of an outdoor stone circle. The stones of the circle line up with the positions on the horizon of the rising and setting sun at the times of the solstices and equinoxes. The most famous example of a Sunwheel is Stonehenge.

Young is also the organizer of the solstice and equinox viewings that occur every year. The event is will be attended by members of the Astronomy department and anyone else who wishes to attend.

Following the viewings, there will be a presentation about the seasons, the sun and moon, as well as a history of the Sunwheel itself. A question and answer session will also take place.

The Autumnal Equinox, which takes place on September 22 at 12:30 p.m. will signify the start of autumn and the days will begin to get shorter soon after. The equinox also signals the time when clocks should be set back one hour at midnight between September 21 and September 22.

For people wishing to visit the Sunwheel, Young advises to dress in warm clothing, suitable for standing still on wet or soggy ground and to arrive at 6:45 a.m. to watch the sunrise and at 6:00 p.m. to watch the sunset. T-shirts and sweatshirts will be on sale and a $3 donation is requested to help cover the cost of future stone work at the site.

If there is rain on either day, the events for that day will be cancelled, though people are always welcome to visit the site by themselves.

The Sunwheel is located south of Alumni Stadium, just off Rocky Hill Road. According to Young, the location was chosen because it provided all necessary elements for an effective Sunwheel, including an open, accessible area, a clear view of the horizons uninhibited by trees or buildings.

The Sunwheel's construction was approved by the Faculty Senate in 1995. Work was then done to find the best location for the Sunwheel on campus and construction began in 1997. Small, two-foot stones were first used for the circle, but a grant from the National Science Foundation in 1999 made it possible to erect eight to 10-foot stones instead, in November 2000.

In the future, Young hopes to do further construction at the Sunwheel, including a stone path and patio, as well as an exhibit of new Moonstones. The cost of construction so far has been $25,000 and the cost of materials has been close to $50,000.

For more information on the Sunwheel, visit www.umass.edu/sunwheel.

SGA struggles to organize the upcoming Senate elections

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Without a sufficient amount of election commissioners, Student Government Association senate elections slated to be held next week in the Dining Commons may have to be held in the Campus Center.

Because the SGA Coordinating Council did not meet regularly this past summer, the Chancellor of the Elections Commission was not elected until a last minute meeting on Sept. 8.

Viktoriya Bonshteyn, who is the new Chancellor of Elections, was not present during the meeting in which she was appointed because it was called just four hours in advance.

Bonshteyn is responsible for appointing election commissioners, whose job it is to oversee senate elections in the various dining commons on campus. Senate elections are scheduled for next Wednesday, Sept. 29 and 30. However, if there are not enough election commissioners, students who would normally vote on their way into dinner, may have to travel a bit further.

Coordinating Council member Pavel Payano says that if elections are held in the Campus Center, the candidates may have to work harder to campaign for votes.

"Maybe this is a good thing," Payano said, "but last year, one DC was closed and it drew in a lot of controversy."

Last spring, during the SGA presidential elections, one polling station in the Berkshire Dining Commons in Southwest Residential area was shut down both mornings of the election, disenfranchising 3,000 Southwest residents.

Payano hopes that a meeting will be called soon to straighten out this confusion. He said that SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins acted irresponsibly this summer by not calling a Coordinating Council meeting.

"He gave 24 hours notice and I live two hours away and I work, so I couldn't attend," Payano said. "Some of the seats knew a week in advance and some didn't even know there was a meeting at all. He doesn't have the power not to recognize anybody; he has broken so many by-laws."

Election commissioners are essential in an election because they maintain the Dining Commons polling stations and count the votes. Without any surveillance at the stations, the entire election may be held at the Campus Center.

At least 10 elections commissioners need to man the Dining Commons. They are assigned to one DC over the five residential areas on campus.

Jeffery Napolitano, secretary of public policy and relations for SGA, says he has some concern about the location of the elections.

"The worst case scenario is that the elections take place in the Campus Center," he said. "The Coordinating Council did not meet this summer and so elections are being rushed since a chancellor was just elected in mid-September, there should have already been two full months of preparations."

Napolitano anticipates over 100 nominations from area residential locations.

"The Chancellor of Elections will go though the papers and verify that there are at least signatures for each and then call a meeting of the senate," he said.

Last year there were well over 150 nominations to the senate, and according to Payano, that was because of the controversy surrounding former Speaker Jared Nokes and the ALANA seats. Nokes refused to recognize the seats in the ALANA caucus last year.

"Last year the controversy drew in attention," Payano said, "people saw injustice."

Napolitano, who is unsure of the exact number of senate seats available, expects that the seats will be heavily contested.

The number of senate seats available is unclear because Speaker Patrick Higgins has not completed the apportionment process. According to SGA by-laws, there should be one senator elected for every 250 students. It is has not been determined by Higgins how many students reside on campus in the different residential areas.

Internet website claims second American hostage executed

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A posting on an Islamic Web site claimed Tuesday that the al-Qaida-linked group led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi has slain a second American hostage in Iraq. The claim could not be verified immediately.

The group kidnapped two Americans — Jack Hensley and Eugene Armstrong — along with Briton Kenneth Bigley in Baghdad on Sept. 16. Armstrong was beheaded by al-Zarqawi and the militants on Monday posted a gruesome video of his death.

The new posting came as a 24-hour deadline set by al-Zarqawi's Tawhid and Jihad group passed for the release of all Iraqi women from U.S. custody.

"The nation's zealous sons slaughtered the second American hostage after the end of the deadline," the statement said, and it promised to provide video proof of the death soon. It was signed with the pseudonym Abu Maysara al-Iraqi, the name usually used on statements from al-Zarqawi's group.

The brief statement did not give the name of the hostage killed. A Western diplomat in Baghdad, speaking on condition of anonymity, said authorities could not confirm the slaying because they had no body.

A car bomb struck a U.S. patrol on the road to Baghdad's airport Tuesday, wounding four American soldiers and several Iraqis. The car bomb destroyed an armored Humvee and about 10 civilian vehicles on the highway. Ambulances rushed at least two women, a child and three wounded men to a hospital.

September has seen more than 30 car bombings as insurgents intensify a strategy of explosions and abductions in their campaign against U.S. forces and the allied government of Prime Minister Ayad Allawi.

The military announced Tuesday that two Marines were killed in action west of Baghdad, one in an attack on Monday, the other dying of wounds from an earlier incident. More that 1,000 U.S. service members have died in Iraq since March 2003.

The slaying of Armstrong — a 52-year-old civil engineer originally from Hillsdale, Mich. — was shown in a video released Monday in which a militant read out a statement saying it was in revenge for the jailing of Muslim women and setting the 24-hour deadline for the killing of the next hostage.

A CIA official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the agency's technical analysis determined with a "high degree of confidence" that the voice on the video is that of al-Zarqawi and that he personally beheaded Armstrong. A text on the video also claims that al-Zarqawi himself killed the American.

Armstrong's body was found Monday hours before the news of his beheading became public, discovered near a highway overpass a few blocks from where he lived in the leafy west Baghdad neighborhood of Mansour, officials and witnesses said Tuesday.

In New York, President Bush condemned the beheading and told the visiting Iraqi prime minister on Tuesday that "we will not allow these thugs to decide your fate."

He expressed "heartfelt condolences" to Armstrong's family and said "we all stand in solidarity with the American that is now being held captive."

Secretary of State Colin Powell said Armstrong's slaying was carried out by "terrorists who do not want to see the Iraqi people live in peace and freedom."

"They have to be dealt with," Powell said. "This is not the time to think that we can walk away or run away from this challenge."

In the nine-minute video of Armstrong's death, posted

UMass professor awarded Fulbright Scholar grant

By Alfred Letendre
Collegian Correspondent

A Fulbright Scholar grant has been awarded to University of Massachusetts Professor of Linguistics and Philosophy Barbara Partee.

The grant will enable Partee to lecture at the Russian State University of the Humanities and Moscow State University in Russia from January to June of 2005.

The primary objective of the Fulbright program is to bring about working academic relationships with other nations in hopes of closing various academic gaps throughout the world. Fulbright grants are given to people who exhibit unwavering dedication, leadership and potential in their academic field.

Partee's field of research is semantics, which she defines as "the study of meanings." Partee will attempt to integrate Russian and American semantic styles — or the style of meanings in languages — by combining western structural semantics with Russian lexical semantics.

The two styles of semantics differ immensely. The Russian approach is primarily meaning based, while the American approach focuses intently on technicality and structure. Partee says it is her aspiration to establish a new style, which utilizes the semantic principals of both nations.

This will be the seventh consecutive year in which Partee travels to Russia to conduct research. This is the first year however, that it will be funded. Partee has footed the majority of the financial burden of her research prior to this point.

COURTESY UMASS.EDU

University of Massachusetts professor Barbara Partee.

While she is partially retired she has been splitting her time between Amherst and Moscow. Not only has Partee been without funding for the duration of her research, but she also has essentially been without pay, earning approximately $400 per semester.

Partee, however, underplays her financial sacrifices. "UMass has been a Utopia for me," she said.

In addition to The Fulbright grant, Partee has also recently received additional funding for her research by way of a National Science Foundation grant, which will help to fund additional research that "focuses on the semantics and distribution of the Russian genitive of negation and its relation to a range of issues," according to Partee's Web site.

Partee speaks passionately about the Linguistics department here at UMass. She says she believes strongly that the Universities Linguistic PHD program rivals the best in the nation.

According to Partee, many of her colleagues have received lucrative offers from esteemed Ivy League universities, only to turn them down in favor of the superior UMass program.

Partee's husband, Borschev Partee, also shares her interests in semantics and will be traveling with her to Moscow to aid in her research. The two have been married since 1997.

Professor Partee received a B.A. in Mathematics, from Swarthmore College with minors in Russian and Philosophy, and a Ph.D. in linguistics, with a minor in mathematics, from M.I.T in 1965.

CBS apologizes for story

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — CBS News apologized Monday for a "mistake in judgment" in its story questioning President Bush's National Guard service, claiming it was misled by the source of documents that several experts have dismissed as fakes.

The network said it would appoint an independent panel to look at its reporting about the memos. The story has mushroomed into a major media scandal, threatening the reputations of CBS News and chief anchor Dan Rather.

It also has become an issue in the presidential campaign. The White House said the affair raises questions about the connections between CBS's source, retired Texas National Guard officer Bill Burkett, and Democrat John Kerry's campaign. A Kerry adviser also said he had called Burkett at the request of a CBS producer.

Rather joined CBS News President Andrew Heyward in issuing an apology Monday.

"We made a mistake in judgment, and for that I am sorry," Rather said. "It was an error that was made, however, in good faith and in the spirit of trying to carry on a CBS News tradition of investigative reporting without fear or favoritism."

Almost immediately after the story aired Sept. 8, document experts questioned memos purportedly written by Bush's late squadron leader, Lt. Col. Jerry B. Killian, saying they appeared to have been created on a computer and not on the kind of typewriter in use during the 1970s.

CBS strongly defended its story. It wasn't until a week later — after Killian's former secretary said she believed the memos were fake — that the news division admitted they were questionable.

Burkett admitted this weekend to CBS that he lied about obtaining the documents from another former National Guard member, the network said. CBS hasn't been able to conclusively tell how he got them, or even definitely tell whether they're fakes or not. But the network has given up trying to defend them.

"Based on what we now know, CBS News cannot prove that the documents are authentic, which is the only acceptable journalistic standard to justify using them in the report," Heyward said. "We should not

K-9 Unit assists in arrests

Two vehicle searches result in three charges

Tuesday September 14

1:43 a.m. A caller reported several subjects standing outside their room window in McNamara Hall in Sylvan yelling and throwing things out the window. The officer reported the parties were stringing up Christmas lights and they had stopped for the evening.

1:59 a.m. A party reported being approached by a suspicious person attempting to sell stolen CDs and DVDs. A report was taken.

9:47 a.m. Two stereo speakers valued at approximately $110 were reported missing from a vehicle in Lot 44.

7:43 p.m. A party in Van Meter Hall stated a subject threatened them with bodily harm as well as destruction of their vehicle. The investigating officer stated no such threats had been made, and the subject apologized for scaring the party.

10:29 p.m. Voices and projectile rocks were reported coming from bushes in Lot 33. No one was found.

Wednesday September 15

12:48 a.m. A caller from Moore Hall in Southwest stated that subjects appeared to be smoking marijuana. The responding officer confiscated a pipe and returned subjects to their rooms.

9:06 p.m. Gregory Warfield of Hyannis was arrested in Lot 11 for possession of alcohol under the age of 21.

10:35 p.m. A caller from Dickinson Hall reported individuals running up and down the dorm halls writing obscenities on white boards. The responding officer stated subjects had left the area.

11:01 p.m. A police officer warned a group of students found breaking bottles against Greenough Hall.

11:57 p.m. 20 to 30 subjects were reported standing in the Sylvan courtyard, yelling, "Yankees suck." An officer investigated the area and reported all to be quiet.

Thursday September 16

3:20 p.m. A party outside the Admissions Building stated that the rear window of a vehicle was shattered. The Physical Plant will replace the window.

5:26 p.m. Evan Levine, 20, of Chappaqua, N.Y., and Aaron Mackles, 20, of Millwood, N.Y., were arrested at Cance Hall and charged with possession of alcohol under the age of 21.

8:33 p.m. Jon Hambley, 19, of South Hadley was arrested at Washington Hall for possession of alcohol under the age of 21.

9:08 p.m. A UMPD K-9 unit was requested to aid in a search after a driver eluded the Massachusetts State Police and abandoned the vehicle in a Southwest tow zone.

11:32 p.m. A subject was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital after kicking a sign and cutting their foot.

Friday September 17

3:05 p.m. Theft was reported in a car in Lot 44 with the lock on the driver's side pulled out and the steering column ripped apart. A report was taken.

Saturday September 18

12:53 a.m. Amherst Fire Department was called to transport a subject to Cooley Dickinson Hospital who was breathing but unresponsive after drinking in a room in Brown Hall.

1:47 a.m. A caller reported an intoxicated person sitting on a golf cart in the Parking Garage. The subject was taken into protective custody and transported by Amherst Fire Department to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for a leg puncture wound.

2:40 a.m. Police arrested Christopher Lepkowski, 19, of Ballston Lake, N.Y. in Lot 32 for a second offense DUI, as well as negligent care in starting, stopping, backing, and turning a vehicle and false identification.

4:32 a.m. A laptop and other items were reported stolen from McNamara Hall. The party stated they knew who stole the items. The officer spoke with the suspect, who admitted to taking the items. A summons will be issued for larceny.

7:24 p.m. Andrew Cameron, 19, of Pittsfield was arrested for possession of alcohol under the age of 21 in Lot 21.

8:07 p.m. In Lot 33, police arrested Joseph Drain, 18, Brian Travers, 19, Christopher Lyons, 20, and Thomas Shannon, 18, all of Milton, for possession of alcohol under the age of 21.

9:12 p.m. Kevin White, 19, of Georgetown was arrested for possession of alcohol under the age of 21 in Lot 22.

9:27 p.m. Krista Lynn, 19, and Brian Caron, 19, both of Chelmsford, were arrested for possession of alcohol under the age of 21 in Lot 32.

11:40 p.m. A K-9 unit was requested to search a vehicle during a traffic stop on University Drive. Officers arrested Annawon Weeden, 32, of New Bedford for possession of a Class D drug. Also arrested was Matthew Byron, 19, of Ledyard, Conn., for possession of a Class D drug, possession of alcohol under the age of 21, and an equipment violation.

Sunday September 19

1:34 a.m. A K-9 was requested for a vehicle search. Timothy Coco, 19, of Haverhill was charged with possession and possession to distribute a Class D drug, disorderly conduct, resisting arrest, possession of a Class B drug, and possession of alcohol under the age of 21.

American hostage beheaded

Monday on the Internet, the sobbing, blindfolded hostage knelt in front of five masked militants dressed in black, with a black Tawhid and Jihad banner on the wall behind them.

The man believed to be al-Zarqawi, standing the center, read a statement, then pulled a knife, grabbed the hostage seated at his feet and sliced his head off. The victim screamed and blood poured from his neck.

"You, sister, rejoice. God's soldiers are coming to get you out of your chains and restore your purity by returning you to your mother and father," the speaker said, addressing Iraqi women in U.S.-run jails in Iraq.

The U.S. military says the only two women in its custody in Iraq are two security prisoners: Dr. Rihab Rashid Taha, a scientist who became known as "Dr. Germ" for helping Iraq make weapons out of anthrax, and Huda Salih Mahdi Ammash, a biotech researcher known as "Mrs. Anthrax."

In the hours before the Tuesday deadline, relatives pleaded for the lives of the two remaining hostages, the 48-year-old Hensley of Marrietta, Ga., and the 62-year-old Bigley of Britain.

Pati Hensley, Jack Hensley's wife, appealed to his captors Tuesday to open lines of communication and spare his life.

"I understand their political agenda, but what I need them to understand is the man who I have been with for 23 years, who is the father of our 13-year-old daughter, who does not understand this situation, why someone would want to hurt her father," she said in an interview with CNN. "I would plead with them to please realize this man does not deserve this fate."

In London, the Bigley family

Hundreds dead after severe floods strike from Tropical Storm Jeanne

By Amy Bracken
Associated Press

GONAIVES, Haiti — Blood swirled in knee-deep floodwaters as workers stacked bodies outside the hospital morgue Tuesday. Carcasses of pigs, goats and dogs and pieces of smashed furniture floated in muddy streams that once were the streets of this battered city. Desperate people swarmed a truck delivering water.

The death toll across Haiti from the weekend deluges brought by Tropical Storm Jeanne rose to 691, with 600 of them in Gonaives, and officials said they expected to find more dead and estimated tens of thousands of people were homeless.

Waterlines up to 10 feet high on Gonaives' buildings marked the worst of the storm that sent water gushing down denuded hills, destroying homes and crops in the Artibonite region that is Haiti's breadbasket.

Floodwaters receded, but half of Haiti's third-largest city was still swamped with contaminated water up to two feet deep four days after Jeanne passed. Not a house in the city of 250,000 people escaped damage. The homeless sloshed through the streets carrying belongings on their heads, while people with houses that still had roofs tried to dry scavenged clothes.

"We're going to start burying people in mass graves," said Toussaint Kongo-Doudou, a spokesman for the U.N. peacekeeping mission in Haiti. Some victims were buried Monday.

Flies buzzed around bloated corpses piled high at the city's three morgues, where the electricity was off as temperatures reached into the 90s.

Only about 30 of the 250 bodies at the morgue of the flood-damaged General Hospital hade been identified, said Dr. Daniel Rubens of the International Red Cross. Many of the dead there were children.

"I lost my kids and there's nothing I can do," said Jean Estimable, whose 2-year-old daughter was killed and another of his five children was missing and presumed dead.

Dieufort Desloges, spokesman for the civil protection agency, said he expected the death toll to rise as reports came in from outlying villages and estimated a quarter million Haitians had been made homeless.

More than 1,000 people were missing, said Raoul Elysee, head of the Haitian Red Cross, which was trying desperately to find doctors to help. The international aid group CARE said 85 of its 200 workers in Gonaives were unaccounted for.

"It's really catastrophic. We're still discovering bodies," said Francoise Gruloos of the U.N. Children's Fund.

Brazilian and Jordanian troops in the U.N. peacekeeping mission sent to stabilize Haiti after rebels ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in February struggled to help the needy as aid workers ferried supplies of water and food to victims.

CARE spokesman Rick Perera said the agency had about 660 tons of dry food in Gonaives, including corn-soy blend, dried lentils and cooking oil and was trying to set up distribution points. Police said aid vehicles were being waylaid by mobs on the outskirts of Gonaives. One truck that made it to City Hall in the town center was swarmed by people who began throwing its load of bagged water into the crowd, setting off a melee. The driver finally sped off, bouncing people off the truck.

Addressing the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, Haiti's interim president, Boniface Alexandre, pleaded for help.

"In the face of this tragedy ... I appeal urgently for the solidarity of the international community so it may once again support the government in the framework of emergency assistance," he said. The European Union sent $1.8 million in urgent aid, to be distributed by the Red Cross and other aid agencies, according to EU Development Commissioner Poul Nielson.

Venezuela's government is sending $1 million as well as a boat loaded with food, water, tents and a rescue squad. Venezuelan Information Minister Andres Izarra said.

On Monday, the U.S. Embassy announced $60,000 in immediate relief aid, an amount criticized as "a drop in the bucket" by U.S. Rep. Kendrick Meek, D-Fla., whose district includes some of the Miami area's Haitian community.

"The government of Haiti is totally unequipped and unable to deal with this massive crisis, because they have neither the resources nor the organization," Meek said in a statement. "Private voluntary groups are reportedly overwhelmed by the enormity of this crisis."

have used them."

CBS said it approached Burkett initially about the documents. Rather said Burkett was well known in National Guard circles for several years for trying to discredit Bush's military record.

Burkett, in an interview with Rather aired on the "CBS Evening News," said he was pressured by CBS to reveal his source for the documents, and "I simply threw out a name that was basically, I guess, to get a little pressure off for the moment."

He said he didn't fake or forge any documents.

"I didn't totally mislead you," he said. "I did mislead you about one individual."

Burkett said he also insisted that CBS authenticate the documents on its own. Two document experts consulted by CBS later said they raised red flags that network officials apparently disregarded. Rather acknowledged CBS failed to properly determine whether the documents were genuine.

Burkett did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press.

Heyward told The Associated Press it was not clear what, if any, disciplinary action would be taken against CBS News employees. Besides tainting the network's flagship broadcast, "60 Minutes," the report was a damaging blow to Rather, 72. Some have suggested the scandal, along with the low ratings of the "CBS Evening News," could hasten Rather's retirement.

"Please know that nothing is more important to us than people's trust in our ability and our commitment to report fairly and truthfully," Rather said.

Alex Jones, director of Harvard University's Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy, said it appeared to be an honest mistake by CBS, not a willful attempt to deceive. But he said the network was too slow to respond. "I think that their delaying and obvious resistance to acknowledge the evident realities has kept the story alive a lot longer than it needed to be and was a lot more damaging to CBS than it needed to be," he said.

For "60 Minutes," it's the biggest ethical mess since the 1995 incident captured in the movie "The Insider," which depicted the newsmagazine caving to pressure from CBS lawyers and not airing a whistleblowing report from an ex-tobacco executive.

Jones said questions will probably center on the story's producer, Mary Mapes. She's one of the network's top investigators and broke the story of the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal photos. Her immediate boss is Josh Howard, recently named executive producer of the "60 Minutes" Wednesday edition.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the White House appreciated CBS's expression of regret but that there were still serious questions about Burkett.

"Bill Burkett, who CBS now says is their source, in fact is not an unimpeachable source as was previously claimed," McLellan said. "Bill Burkett is a source who has been discredited and so this raises a lot of questions. There were media reports about Mr. Burkett having senior level contacts with the Kerry campaign."

The Kerry campaign has said it had nothing to do with the story.

asked British Prime Minister Tony Blair to meet the captors' demands.

"I ask Tony Blair personally to consider the amount of bloodshed already suffered," Craig Bigley, 33, said in a videotaped statement. "Please meet the demands and release my father — two women for two men. ... Only you can save him now. You have children and you will understand how I feel at this time."

Blair condemned the kidnappings at a news conference Monday.

"But our response has not got to be to weaken," he said. "Our response has got to be to stand firm."

Tawhid and Jihad — Arabic for "Monotheism and Holy War" — has claimed responsibility for the slaying of at least six hostages in the past, including American Nicholas Berg, who was abducted in April. The group has also said it is behind a number of bombings and gun attacks.

More than 130 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq, and at least 26 of them have been executed. Iraqis have also faced an epidemic of kidnappings in the chaos since the fall of Saddam Hussein last year, in many cases for ransom.

The kidnappers' demands and stopped working in Iraq, the Foreign Ministry said. Top had been abducted north of Baghdad on Aug. 5 by kidnappers who threatened to behead him.

UMass students seek out polls

With time running out, students at the University of Massachusetts have asked state Rep. Ellen Story, D-Amherst, to help them get a polling place on the Amherst campus.

To establish a polling place for this November's election, a special bill would have to be filed with the Legislature within the next two weeks, said Brian Roberts, who is coordinating the effort the Student Government Association.

The Amherst Select Board endorsed the idea at its August meeting, but said special state legislation was needed to have it operating by November.

I vote for No One

Sanam Hakim

I hate it when people tell me whom I should vote for. "Your vote counts," they say, as they hand me a "Vote for Bush" flyer, or a Socialist newspaper, or a "Vote Democrat 2004" bumper sticker. My vote counts for what, another tally on your list of supporters or perhaps a brief satisfaction of pressing your views on an innocent passerby?

In a way, I find it insulting. Here I am, a student of public higher education, apparently so weak in opinion and low in intelligence that, in one minute of talking to me, or playing a thirty second commercial, or handing me a colorful little sticker, my whole perspective on life will change.

There are three major problems with this. First of all, the concept of partisan politics is illogical and weak-minded. It is an artificial separation of people, in a society, designed to brainwash the masses to the point where no one even cares anymore. Instead of looking at the individual, we look at the party. He's a Democrat; I'm a Democrat. I will vote Democrat. It's a clever trick if you really think about it: let Americans associate themselves with a group instead of investigating the characters of the individuals running. That way, unqualified individuals are put in positions of power by people who know nothing about them — people who voted for them based on the party they associate with the most, not by looking at the distinguishable qualities of the candidates which separate the good leaders from the bad.

We have become a nation of critics who only focus on negative qualities. We have brought our standards so low that we choose whom we vote for based on how bad the other candidate is.

The backlash of partisan politics is the negativity that comes with it. As the presidential election gets closer and closer, the media is filled with all kinds of propaganda. Republicans broadcast Kerry's congressional record on the radio and point out his constantly changing standpoints. Democrats feverishly remind Americans about Bush's mistakes after the September 11 terrorist attacks. Reformists criticize the election process. Constitutionalists criticize change. Libertarians criticize structure.

We have become a nation of critics who only focus on negative qualities. We have brought our standards so low that we choose whom we vote for based on how bad the other candidate is.

Which brings me right into my third point: that the government and media undermine our intelligence as students of public higher education. We are the future of America, treated as a mindless and vacant group of children. To elected officials, the only people that exist are the people who can elect them. To elected officials, we do not exist because we do not vote.

I say vote. Prove to the nation that we exist and that we are an intelligent group of people. Do not be brainwashed — think about whom you are going to vote for. Take fifteen minutes out of your day and look at the websites of all the candidates who are running for office. Look at the good qualities they will bring to our nation and vote for the one you feel is most qualified.

If you think no one is qualified, vote for no one. Go down to the voting booth, check off "Other," and write out "No One." The elected officials will know we are here; they will know we are watching, but what they won't know, is that we're smarter than they think. If they can't accept that, we'll vote for No One.

Time for changes

S.J. Port

W.B. Yeats wrote, "In dreams begin responsibility." Now is the time for change. In dreams we imagine revolutions, but without responsible activism, dreams continue as abstractions.

In a world where the impossible becomes possible daily we — specifically Americans — have stopped believing in our individual ability to influence the tides. An era of disillusionment and distrust has overwhelmed the once impregnable spirit of the progressive American identity. The land of opportunity has become politically stolid under overbearing bureaucracy; the general sentiment of powerlessness in turn has allowed for an uninvolved citizenry. With so many options in every realm of experience, we, as a people, have been engulfed by consumerism. If every choice is possible, why chose anything? If any change is theoretically possible, which change do we begin with?

Each of us has our own agenda, whether it be gay rights, the environment, reversing Roe v. Wade, or getting out before Bush takes dictatorship to the next level. What every change has in common is its root — empowerment. The empowerment of idea and person arises from an individual citizen's decision to take the steps, small and steady, to work toward a specific agenda.

Some of you have stopped here and said, "But there are so many factions in this country that each faction's agenda cancels out the work of its opposing faction."

This is true. However, not all change has opposition. This is especially true at the local levels, where change has failed to occur only because no one has taken the initiative to nominate change. Two recent examples of unopposed campaigns for change on our own campus are the transition from an eight-point grading system to an eleven-point system and the effort to develop University funding.

Sam Krentzman, a junior Chinese Language and Literature major, took responsibility for organizing a benefit for Durfee Conservatory last year, after its budget was crippled by University cuts.

The Conservatory, located at the base of Central and Orchard Hill, is the 137-year-old home to the University's diverse collection of flora. Old Aggie (the nickname for UMass when it was an agricultural school) was threatened by the state's budget cuts until Krentzman and his gaggle of volunteers assisted Durfee's Interim director Armand Prevost by arranging a concert in the Japanese Gardens.

A success the first time around, Krentzman has repeated his work to change the future of something he cares about by arranging Durfee's second benefit concert, which will take place tomorrow evening between 5:00 and 9:00 p.m. Krentzman asks for a voluntary donation of $5.00 from attendees; the amount is small per person, but collectively will continue the enormous effects Krentzman, Prevost and other volunteers have had on Durfee Conservatory.

The loudest voice finds its way to the masses, and the most deep-felt issues can move to the federal level if empowered with the weight of an active citizenry.

This kind of work makes a difference to life on campus, but it is also an example of taking responsibility for change.

The issues of factional conflict on issues of change comes into play in less concrete issues, such as free-tutoring for student-athletes, the prayer over the Massachusetts House of Representatives' session, or ongoing issues between Israel and Palestine. However, it is the existence of factional contests that keeps democracy pumping strong through our veins.

Our founding father's depended on people's divergent interests to challenge one another — and in turn the government. Involved citizens have a hegemonic power over our amorphous government: read our Constitution and send me an email if you don't find the people's potency inscribed in our history. Nobody can demarcate your value as a participating citizen.

Others reading this may have begun to scoff at my seeming naiveté, my idealism and my belief in the American system. If this is you, I ask only that you read on and keep your scoffs to yourself, for the revolution commencing in your neighbors mind is delicate, easily killed by your sneers.

Some change is quick. Two years ago the Student Government Association was not making use of its seat at Faculty Senate, but after a Collegian editorial expressed this, an SGA representative appeared at the following week's Faculty Senate meeting and has remained in place to speak for the student body ever since. The more local and specific the issue, the easier it is to influence.

Other change takes time. As a member of Town Meeting, my father helped to wage a 10-year battle to establish any kind of affordable housing in our community.

Remember, the squeaky wheel gets the grease; the loudest voice finds its way to the masses, and the most deep-felt issues can move to the federal level if empowered with the weight of an active citizenry.

Do not feed into the bitterness. The overly used, common stereotype of the "dirty politician" and "corrupt government" make my stomach flop and my heart sink each time I hear them used. The fact is there aren't enough politicians.

Progress is standing up and participating by taking one small step after another. Choose your battle, work steadily, and you shall see progress. If sounds naive, perhaps even ridiculously simple, but it's all true.

Inside the SGA

Pavel Payano

For the past year, conflict, controversy, and corruption have filled the Student Government Association to a point where it has disconnected itself from the students it is supposed to represent.

In fact, many students do not even know what the SGA is, nor do they know about the potential ability the SGA has to solve the problems (e.g. overpriced textbooks, high tuition bill, the need for more teachers, etc.) that we students face.

Luckily I was chosen by my constituency last year to represent them as a Senator for the Central Residential Area. Since the day I was inaugurated I have witnessed corruption and conflict plague the SGA.

Yet, after all the stress and the fighting, I realize that in some places some people judge the color of my skin, my accent or the country of my birth before they judge the content of my character.

Throughout last year, there have been times that bigotry and hatred ruled and conquered the senate. To point out an example to the newcomers of this University, last year's senators had many heated debates that lasted several hours over the issue of whether to say the Pledge of Allegiance before or during the announcements portion of the senate meeting.

Throughout this meeting, phrases from senators like "go back to your country," or, "Africa has nothing to do with the United States," defined the mood and the mind frame of many senators in that meeting. At the end of this, over five hour meeting, I found myself to be in a position of "privilege" when a group of senators dubbed me with the responsibility as being one of those "certain people" that ruin the Senate, even though at that meeting I never opposed them.

Another example of those times of controversy was last year when the SGA elections were thrown out after the University's first minority President in seven years, won fairly. Although he won the first time by several hundred votes, he was forced to run a second time. A process, which I would like to point out, is very time consuming and requires a great deal of energy.

With the election of a hard-working, progressive president, I believed that these types of conflicts would end. Over the summer, however, I was soon proven wrong. During the summer, when the Senate is not in session, a group of senators, chaired by the Speaker of the Senate, formed the Coordinating Council. These students met to deal with important issues of the SGA. In order to ensure a successful summer for the Senate, I made sure to become a member for this council because I did not want a repeat of last year.

This summer the Speaker violated so many laws and bylaws in the SGA Constitution that even I can no longer distinguish what's right from wrong.

However, the Speaker of the Senate, Patrick Higgins, decided that instead of fixing up the wounds in the SGA, he would tear those wounds deeper and remind us of summers past. This summer, the Speaker violated so many laws and bylaws in the SGA Constitution that even I can no longer distinguish what's right from wrong.

Higgins began his first Coordinating Council meeting displaying a high degree of incompetence. Speaker Higgins' friends were told, up to a week before the meeting took place, of its time and location. Others, however, were not as lucky. Four ALANA Caucus members, who were also Coordinating Council members, (the ALANA Caucus is a legislative body in the SGA that advocates for racial and ethnic diversity in this University) were not even told the meeting was going to take place.

He gave me, an elected Coordinating Council member, what he called "reasonable notice" — an email twenty-four hours before the meeting took place. I think that when a person lives hours away from campus, in the middle of the summer, a reasonable time should have been exactly the amount notice his friends received.

President Bustamante also got "reasonable notice" to attend the Coordinating Council meeting. What boggles my mind about the short notice given to the President is that his office is only 15 steps away from Higgins's office.

Because the Speaker has "moral objections" to following the by-laws, specifically those that allow for ALANA Caucus appointed seats, he chose not to hold another senate meeting for the entire summer. The elections, to take place in a week, are being rushed, and an unnecessary burden has fallen on the shoulders of the Chancellor of Elections. This is all because the Speaker was not willing to recognize those senators, dedicated to diversity issues, until a day before school began.

I write this to not only let the Student Body know what went on this summer, but also to let the Senate nominees understand the issues that they are going to be dealing with. Even though the Senate was personally full of mental and physical hardship, I still believe there is hope.

That hope is you, the incoming senators and an informed student body.

Flirting with fate

Thomas Naughton

I was going to pee my pants when I heard his deep voice.

"Hey, Red!" The stubby Italian boy in the FILA sweat suit shouted at me.

I, of course, looked around, rationalizing that he was talking to someone else since we did not know one another. So I turned my back to him and stared out into the street. It was a Thursday night in Cambridge, and it was that limbo time between fall and winter in November when its like our hemisphere is feeling the sun's warmth inch further away, and the meteorological forces are taking a deep breath to decide what to do next.

I needed some air before going back into Manray, the club that my friends and I had escaped UMass to go to. Sometimes all the loud music, loud boys, crazy drag queens and constant posing can be overwhelming.

"Do you speak English, Red? I'm talking to you, cutie." The FILA boy shouted again at me.

He was absolutely talking to me. This huge guy whose arms were as big as my thighs was definitely addressing the redheaded guy who was standing by himself like a loser, obviously talking to no one else. In other words — me.

I didn't know what to say, and I was kind of scared that this kid was just a frat boy who was out on a dare to humiliate an oddly-dressed gay guy, so I did what any suave young stud would do to a perspective date: I waved. As I waved, I said to myself, "Self, you are so stupid for waving right now."

"Alls I get is a wave? Ouch, Red, you must got a boyfriend or somethin', cause I know you ain't gonna snub a nice guy like me who's only tryin to holla."

I remember to this day every word he said because no one has ever talked to me that way before, and I doubt anyone will ever again. He was bold; I loved it, it made my heart beat faster.

He walked right over to me and grabbed my hand in his huge, stubbly, veiny hand that was calloused from lifting weights. He introduced himself as Dino, but he said I could call him "D". He was very Italian, very dark, very handsome, very sure of himself and very big in comparison to me.

My eyes were huge and immature taking in Dino's bold flirtation; I was only 19 and Dino was at least 24. I always thought of myself (despite some of my behavior) as somewhat mature for my age, but because it was my first time at Manray, I felt quite young, and even younger with Dino's huge arm around me.

We must have looked so strange together. He, very muscled and into hip-hop culture and I, slim with a Mohawk and a Freddy Kruger sweater. That kind of stuff is what makes these situations so amazing, people who for all intents and purposes should not be together in close quarters and getting closer. The night was ending and I was headed back to UMass that same night in hopes of perhaps getting enough sleep to make it to one of my classes in the morning. Dino pulled me over to him.

"You better be comin' home soon. I'm just getting started with you." He kissed me for what seemed like a long time and I felt my knees buckle and heard my friends laughing at this maudlin PDA, which I was kind of laughing at myself.

For the next few months, Dino and I talked every day, sometimes more than twice a day. We hung out a couple times very briefly to get coffee in Boston when I was home on odd weekends. Then he just disappeared.

It didn't strike me as strange, or even upsetting really. Dino was just a guy I talked to, kissed a couple times. I figured he found a boyfriend and didn't need to keep calling some kid who was an hour or so away.

I heard from Dino that summer; almost six months had gone by. He had gone to jail for a little while for some mishap in New York City that he didn't want to tell me about. It was good to hear his deep voice and smooth talk again. He then disappeared again, very quickly. In the meantime, I had been in some crazy situations, crazy relationships and well, it was easy for such a breezy character like him to slip out of my preoccupied mind.

When I saw "Dino calling" on my cell-phone caller ID last spring, I laughed out loud. It had been months since I had heard from him. He said he had been in California; he had done some modeling, and he was back in Massachusetts for good.

"Why for good? You're too young to retire," I said coyly. "Well at least we can hang out now."

"Yeah, we definitely can hang out now." He said and then his voice dropped, "I gotta tell you something first."

"You got a sex-change in Cali and now you want me to call you Dianna," I said, thinking I was so clever.

"No," he said and then laughed, "I have HIV."

All I could say was, "Oh."

Then I started to cry a little from the shock, and I told him how sorry I was. He had unprotected sex with his boyfriend who was cheating and had contracted the disease.

"Dino, I still want to hang out with you, I want to help you in any way I can," I choked.

"Red, its all good, it's gonna be all good and yeah, we can still hang, I just wanted to be straight with you."

"D, straight with me is something you never wanted to be!" I said to break the tension and we both laughed loudly.

I didn't speak to Dino again after that. We never hung out. He killed himself days after.

It was like it always was: Dino came into my life, made me smile and then disappeared. The difference was this time, there wasn't going to be another appearance. I cried a little when I heard; I cried for this boy I didn't know well, but who had made a definite impression on me. I cried because his death posed many questions to me, questions I knew I could answer and those answers, which were made useless by his death became weighty and sad for me, even now.

I couldn't help but wonder, if he hadn't disappeared, would he have stayed with me, would he have gotten the HIV virus and would I be asking these questions today? My questions, however, make me think of fate and ancient history. Early civilizations knew not to mess with fate, and I know in my heart I could never have changed his.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STUDENT ABROAD SAYS BEER SHEVA ATTACKS SIGNIFICANT

As a UMass student studying at Beer Sheva, Israel, I was deeply offended by Yousef Munayyer's article on September 14, "Page A12." That day's bombing was significant for several reasons, leading to its eye-catching placement in the New York Times. First, Beer Sheva had previously been shielded from terrorism, as this was the first act of terrorism to hit the desert community. Additionally, this was the first major suicide bombing in Israel in five or six months.

More important than the significance of the attack, however, is Yousef's claim that the media is biased. There is no denying that fact. However, he only uses one newspaper as the source of his argument; in order to make such a claim of a pro-Israel media, a breadth of sources is needed. Using solely the New York Times fails to prove his argument.

Finally, I do not find it surprising that the newspaper did not give the Gaza bombing as much coverage. Hamas outright admitted that those 15 Palestinians who perished in the bombing were members of Hamas and were training. Why should it be a surprise that terrorists were killed?

SOLDIER DEFENDS BUSH'S ACTIONS

I would like to comment on "A Mistaken War" which appeared in last Thursday's Collegian. I am a soldier in the U.S. Army, proudly serving our country for the past three years, and for many years to come. President Bush did not "send our troops into battle without needed protective equipment" as claimed; we can thank President Clinton for that, due in part because of massive dollar cuts in the military, for example.

It was not until President Bush took office that those serving our country in uniform saw a much deserved pay increase, benefit expansion and an influx of dollars to help upgrade a deteriorating arsenal of equipment.

The bill President Bush recently signed into law (while Senator Kerry was absent to vote on the legislation) increased funding to outfit my fellow soldiers with new bulletproof vests that provide more protection than the old flak-jackets and also provided funds to upgrade body armor on the widely used M998 (Hummvee).

Our military has grown larger and stronger because of the leadership of our current President. He has done his best to give soldiers the tools needed to be effective on the battlefield. It is a shame that President Bush had to play "catch-up" because of the previous administration's shortcomings.

Kweli to deliver 'quality' performance

Rawkus Records recording artist plays Pearl St. nightclub

Rapper Talib Kweli comes to Pearl St. Nightclub in Northampton this Thursday. His 'Connected' tour features L.E.G.A.C.Y, and Foreign Excange.

Monique Jemmott
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Talib Kweli is not like many MC's. You will not hear him 'Big Pimpin' or giving advice on how to stay a step ahead of the police when selling drugs. He doesn't have war stories to boast about, or a near death experience to catapult him into the limelight—what Talib Kweli has is pure, unadulterated talent, and a hunger to share it with the world.

This Thursday at the Pearl St. Nightclub, at 8pm, you can catch Rawkus recording artist Talib Kweli on the 'Connected' Tour. Along with Foreign Exchange,L.E.G.A.C.Y, and the Away Team; Northampton will feel the power of superior lyricism.

A Brooklyn native, Talib Kweli got his start much like other hip hop artists — on the frontlines known as MC battles. He and longtime friend Mos Def met here, and continued on to make music together. Along with Cincinnati Producer/DJ Hi Tek, Kweli went on to be featured on Rawkus Record's first volume of their compilation album 'Soundbombing ' with a track called 'Fortified Live,' which went on to be hailed as a classic amongst the underground scene, and establish Kweli as a wordsmith as the top of his game.

In 1998, Kweli teamed up with Mos Def, to release 'Mos Def and Talib Kweli are Blackstar.' The group named after the shipping line company of Revolutionary/activist Marcus Garvey, was among 1998's best albums, and one of the most introspective looks at urban life in a long while at this period. With tracks like 'Respiration,' and 'KOS Determination,' they proved to be worlds apart from their Hip Hop counterparts.

Kweli went on to release and album with DJ Hi Tek in 2000 titled 'Reflection Eternal.' It was on this album that he garned some mainstream noteriety with the single 'The Blast' whose video received airplay from both BET, and MTV.

Finally in 2002, Kweli released a solo album titled 'Quality.' Depsite it's upbeat feel, and more mainstream approach, there was still no denying what Kweli is made of as an artist. Tracks like 'Get by' and 'Wont you stay' played on the emotional strings of listeners; while 'Good to you' proved to the naysayers that the artist they had grown to appreciate and respect was still intact and that there would be no trading 'Quality' for success.

Kweli has continued to remain the alternative to the nightmare that hip-hop has become today — and not just for what he says, but also what he does. His messages of hope, and truth transcend the recording booth. In 1998, Talib, along with Mos Def took on the responsibility of ensuring that one of their Brooklyn neighborhoods landmarks— Nikuri booktore, remained opened despite financial troubles. The two bought the bookstore, and converted it to the Nikuri center for education and culture, a non-profit organization that promotes literature and culture.

'I always try to make responsible music' Kweli says in an interview with Blackbook magazine in 2003 'I have the inclinantion to speal about things going on, but you can drive yourself crazy doing that — you come off as preachy.' There seems to be no issue with fans about sounding preachy: being at a Talib Kweli concert is like being at a sing along. Fans, and admirers nod their head like their listening to the gospel on a Sunday afternoon and mouth each and every word, like their lives depend on it — and with good reason how can you resist singing along when you hear songs such as get by:

'This morning/I woke up/feeling brand new/and I jumped up/feeling my highs/and my lows/and my soul/and my goals/just to stop smoking/and stop drinking and I been thinking/I got my reasons/just to get by.'

To the untrained eye, Kweli's world seems to be grounded in nobility, and a desire to be the missing link in hip hop, and seems to make sense — the meaning of his Arabic name is 'student of truth'; and maybe this explains why we so desperately need him to be.

Smithsonian Honors Indian Culture

The building design of the 'Museum of the American Indian' includes representations of various Indian tribes from the United States and Canada.

By FREDERIC J. FROMMER

WASHINGTON — A colorful Native Nations procession heralded the opening Tuesday of the Smithsonian Institution's Museum of the American Indian, the newest addition to the historical treasure — trove dotting the National Mall.

A group of five White Mountain Apache Indians from White River, Ariz., drew a crowd with their exotic dress. Four had their chests painted black with white lettering while the fifth was painted white with black lettering. Pine needles were wrapped around their arms and waists, and wooden headgear reached two feet above their heads, which were covered in masks. As they danced, metal balls around their shoes added to the sounds of an accompanying drummer.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

American Indian families arrive at the Smithsonian in Washington, D.C. for debut of the exhibit.

Nearby, Aztec Indians from San Francisco danced with headfeathers that reached as high as six feet above their heads.

Crowds gathered in crisp weather under a brilliant sun to witness the spectacle in advance of an opening ceremony featuring speeches by Sens. Ben Nighthorse Campbell, R-Colo., and Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii. Peruvian President Alejandro Toledo Manrique and others.

In the afternoon, the museum was to open to the public, and musicians, dancers and storytellers were to begin the First Americans Festival, which will last the rest of the week.

Deanette Ives, vice chairman of the Port Sklallam Gamble Tribe near Kingston, Wash., said she took her 14-year-old daughter out of school to attend the ceremony. "I thought it was important to share this historic moment, "said Ives, wearing a black and red shall embroidered with the tribe's logo, a killer whale. "This is a time she'll remember for the rest of her life."

On Monday, hundreds of people already were milling about the museum to get an early peek. "At last we're getting some kind of recognition as Indian people," said Lawrence Orcutt, from the Yurok tribe in northern California. Dave Anderson, who heads the Bureau of Indian Affairs, said the museum will allow Indians to open a new chapter in the United States. "I look at this whole museum opening as an opportunity for healing, for optimism," he said.

Missing from the opening festivities, however, was the architect who designed the stunning tan building, layered in swooping levels of Minnesota limestone rounded to depict the curves of the Earth, sun and moon: Douglas J. Cardinal, a Canadian, was hired as architect in 1993, but he wound up in a dispute with the architectural firm that he subcontracted for, GBQC of Philadelphia, claiming he was losing money.

The Smithsonian failed to settle the differences between the two parties and fired both in 1998. Another architectural team finished the work.

Two months ago, museum director Richard West wrote Cardinal a three-page letter, asking him to attend Tuesday's opening ceremonies and offering to pay for Cardinal's travel and accommodations.

"There I would like to recognize and thank you publicly for the gift of your work and artistic inspiration to the National Museum of the American Indian in the form of its signature building in the monumental core of America's capital," West wrote.

He called Cardinal's design "a principal physical and, indeed, spiritual marker for the native peoples of this hemisphere long beyond the lives of either of us." Cardinal, a Blackfeet Indian, turned down the offer after consulting with family members and tribal elders.

"It was not a gift but professional work for which I should be reimbursed," wrote Cardinal, who claims he is owed $1 million for the work he did on the museum. Responded Smithsonian spokesman Thomas Sweeney: "The Smithsonian Institution paid Mr. Cardinal up to the time of the termination."

Cardinal's design is unlike any other structure in Washington's wealth of monuments and museum. Built at a cost of $214 million, the sweeping lines represent a communing with nature as the country's tribal peoples did. It houses 8,000 objects from across the Western Hemisphere. Four million visitors a year are expected for the museum's movies and music; paintings, photographs and sculptures; masks, weapons and animals, jewelry and medals, even food and plants.

Toots: Back at it with new album

Legendary reggae artists bring island flavor to valley

Godfathers of reggae Toots and the Maytals performed at Pearl Street in Northampton on Monday night.

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

Folks are drawn to live music for all kinds of reasons. When I check out Medeski, Martin and Wood, I get a shot of funk and a taste of the avant-garde in one sitting, (a "two for the price of one" type deal, if you will). A Phish show is like some grand adventure; one can never quite predict where the music will go, and catching Cold Duck Complex is always a romp through wishful thinking.

But reggae legends Toots and the Maytals, that's something different. A Toots show is just plain fun — once the room heats up, the grooves don't stop.

Hailing from Kingston, Jamaica, where Raleigh Gordon and Jerry Matthias formed the original Maytals in 1962 (both Gordon and Matthias have since passed on), Toots Hibbert et al. first rose to prominence in 1973 when two of their most enduring singles, one of them the stunning "Pressure Drop," were included on "The Harder They Come," a reggae compilation featuring Jimmy Cliff as its standout contributor.

But the Maytals made just as big of a splash, and they made a splash at Pearl Street on Monday night, too. Running through their vast canon of island hits with an ebullience that belied at least Toots' age, (the singer will turn 60 next year). The group kept a mostly packed ballroom on their feet for an uninterrupted performance that lasted close to two hours.

Tunes like "True Love is Hard to Find," "Sweet and Dandy" and the show stopping, "Pressure Drop" hit early on in the show. The band was tight and the sly, sexy beat that typifies reggae music was deep, and in your face.

Later on, Toots treated us to the funky "Reggae Got Soul." "Do the Reggay," which many believe to have named the genre, and "54-46 Was My Number," which recounts his time in prison. All the while, Toots danced and worked the crowd like a man possessed; by show's close, he was dripping.

And so were we. Toots taught us all a valuable lesson that night — always let them see you sweat. Like any performer worth his proverbial salt, Toots knows that energy is circular; the more he enjoys his own performance, the more we do — and we did.

Above, Toots and The Maytals latest album cover art. On top, the original legendary group members on their first project. The band has been credited for the success of mainstream reggae.

Greenday returns to the top

Punk rock trio gets political with album 'American Idiot'

After a long hiatus, punk rockers Greenday return with 'American Idiot'.

By Adam Langlais
(U-WIRE) Kingston, R.I.

By all accounts, Green Day's new release, "American Idiot," should have sucked.

Arguably, it's been years since the band has put out a good album. On their earliest records such as "Kerplunk," "Insomniac" and their major label breakthrough, "Dookie," the Berkeley, Calif., trio established themselves as pop-punk pioneers with an affection for in-your-face snottiness.

But in subsequent years, the boys fell to the background as younger bands seemed poised to take over, and they were left in a bit of a musical purgatory as their only new releases in the past four years consisted of a greatest hits album, and a rarities collection. It would have been perfectly easy then, to write Green Day off as a casualty of an expired musical era — But they have never gone down that easy, and Green Day is ready to kick ass once again.

A self-proclaimed rock opera, "American Idiot" is Green Day's most ambitious album to date. It's both conceptual and self-indulgent; a truly epic album that rips through the classic idea of the American dream.

The opening song (the title track), is chock full of the band's trademark attitude and sparks a political streak that runs through the entire album. It's a blatant shot against the Bush administration — a theme that is revisited in "Holiday," which details the current situation in Iraq.

The highlight of the album is the impressive "Jesus of Suburbia," a nine-minute song that progresses through five unique chapters and never loses its power. Songs such as "St. Jimmy," "She's a Rebel" and "Letterbomb" come closest to the band's older sound. Rather than fall back into their old routine, however, they give it a new polish, underlined with politically charged lyrics.

"American Idiot" is certainly the band's best album to date. If nothing else, it has single-handedly opened up a whole new chapter in their career. Their lyrics have found relevancy for a new generation of audiences stuck in a world of political turmoil.

Listening to this album will make you proud to be a Green Day fan again.

Emusic is born again

By Alex Veiga
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Nearly a year since it was sold by Vivendi Universal to private investors, online retailer eMusic has undergone a facelift that includes a panel of music critics to help users comb its trove of independent music.

The revamped service, scheduled to debut Wednesday, is the latest evolution for the pioneering retailer, the first to sell digital music files online in the late 1990s.

EMusic eschews copy protection technology as consumer-unfriendly, and caters to people whose tastes are largely ignored by mainstream music retailers.

"We're going after the minority of the market who doesn't want to wade through Britney Spears or OutKast," said David Pakman, eMusic's chief operating officer.

The major online music retailers, such as Napster, MusicNet and market-leader iTunes Music Store, sell tunes by mostly major label acts.

The eMusic revamp has been in the works for the better part of a year, since the company was acquired from Vivendi by New York — based Dimensional Associates Inc., the private equity arm of DFS Capital Management Inc.

When Dimensional took over, it began adding staff with experience running subscription-based businesses and immediately changed the pricing model so subscribers could no longer download an unlimited number of tracks.

"That was a negative gross margin business," Pakman said. "The company was losing money," hile eMusic's pricing model remains the same — subscriptions start at $9.99 per month for 40 downloads — what's changed is the means by which users can search and discover new music. So the service has added its panel of so-called music curators.

"What was missing from the e-Music service was a bunch of tools and features to really aid you in discovery process," Pakman said. "What was missing was the curators."

Among the roster of music experts hired by eMusic are former Rolling Stone writer and author Michael Azerrad, former New York Times music critic Ann Powers and Justin Davidson, who won a Pulitzer Prize for his coverage of classical music. The critics will write album reviews, columns, and communicate with subscribers on a message board.

Users will also be able to discuss or swap song recommendations with other subscribers through the message boards and other online community features.

By avoiding tracks from major labels, which only make their content available in file formats that come with licensing and copy protection safeguards, eMusic has also been able to sell its content in the MP3 file format. MP3s can be played on most if not all-digital music players on the market, and can be copied to other computers or burned to CDs without the limits imposed by record companies on other online retailers.

Apprentice wins ratings

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In the battle of rich guys turned TV stars, Donald Trump has it all over Mark Cuban.

Trump drew just under 16 million viewers to NBC last week for the second installment of "The Apprentice 2," according to Nielsen Media Research.

While the series is starting slowly this time around, it's not nearly as slow as Cuban's "The Benefactor." The colorful Dallas Mavericks owner is giving away money on a new ABC reality show, and its debut reached 5.5 million people, Nielsen said. A rerun the following night had fewer than 3 million viewers.

During the week before the official opening of the fall season, the most popular program was — appropriately enough — a rerun, "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation" had 22.3 million viewers.

Two of television's signature events — the Emmy Awards and the Miss America Pageant — both fell out of Nielsen's top 10. The Emmys were seen by only 13.8 million people on ABC Sunday.

have center-back midfielder Tim Kitchell in the game due to a red card he earned in the 3-1 loss to Harvard on Sunday.

Kitchell received the red card at 29:18 against the Crimson after he cleated a Harvard player who was lying on the pitch.

The infraction will open a hole in the UMass defense, one that Koch is confident he can fill with a number of players.

"There are a number of candidates, there is no single one in particular," Koch said. "We're looking at a lot of different variations whether we put Ralph Pace back there, we might have Kenny Cook Back there. Skelton was injured but we'll see how he is and we'll see if he can go back in. So we have a lot of different situations."

Junior captain Craig Canavan, who switched to sweeper earlier in the season, had started the season where Kitchell usually plays. Although he has experience, Koch is more comfortable with him in the back, controlling the defense.

Another issue for the Minutemen has been the play of their typically sound goalkeeping tandem. Senior captain Colin Burns and sophomore Nick Billman continue to split time this year, but neither has been playing well over the last few games.

Both keepers have played three games this season and have given up eight goals each. Koch knows that neither has been up to snuff so far, but is confident in their abilities as the season rolls on.

"I think both of them can play better and I think both of them would say the same thing. I don't think either one is pleased with the way they've played in the last week and a half," Koch said. "I still feel that they continue to work hard in training and their attitudes have been great.

"I think they've both had a couple of off-games and haven't been able to make the big save when I know they are both capable of doing it."

The Wildcats have had mixed results from its offense this year, scoring four goals in five contests. UNH is coming off of its first win of the season, however, with a 1-0 win over Colgate on Saturday.

Ross Fishbain and Tyler Jackson have been leading the way for the Wildcats this year, accounting for five points this year between the two of them.

Freshman Douglas Rappaport dribbles the ball on defense for the Minutemen. Rappaport has started one game for UMass this season.

Hamilton fights charges

at the Athens Olympics.

Asked about Hamilton's reported positive test at the Olympics, IOC medical director Patrick Schamasch said, "For the moment, I can't confirm or deny anything."

IOC spokeswoman Giselle Davies said, "As with all doping procedures, while a process is underway, we can't go into details."

USA Cycling CEO Gerard Bisceglia said the IOC had not said anything to his organization about Hamilton's medal. He said he was waiting to see the results of the tests Hamilton was to take Tuesday.

"We're not in a position to take a position. We hope for the best with this, as we do with any athlete," Bisceglia said.

The U.S. Olympic Committee said it had no comment.

Hamilton's gold was one of four medals won by American cyclists at the Athens Games — the team's best showing since winning nine at the boycotted 1984 Los Angeles Olympics. Hamilton was the only American cyclist to win a gold medal in Athens, and he called that victory "the highlight of my career, by far."

Hamilton's father, Bill, said from the family's home in Marblehead, that he and his wife Lorna had spoken to their son by phone Tuesday.

"He did tell us this was totally bogus," Bill Hamilton said. "He is terribly upset by this whole thing, because now you know you are guilty until proven innocent."

He compared his son's circumstances to those of six-time Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong, a former teammate of Hamilton's who also has denied doping allegations in his career.

"They've tried to bring down Lance Armstrong for years, and now they're trying to bring down Tyler," Bill Hamilton said. "I think it's a witch hunt. It will be proven, mark my words, that this is totally bogus."

Hopkins earns respect with De La Hoya KO

By Bernard Fernandez
Knight Ridder Newspapers

LAS VEGAS — When he was doing time in Graterford penitentiary for robbers, and even after he'd become a world champion, Bernard Hopkins' boxing dreams were confined within the city limits of Philadelphia.

If you asked him back then what he hoped to accomplish as a prizefighter, he'd tell you that one day he wanted his neighbors to place him on a pedestal occupied by such princes of Philly pugilism as Bennie Briscoe, Willie "The Worm" Monroe, Eugene "Cyclone" Hart, Bobby "Boogaloo" Watts and George Benton.

"Those guys are legends," Hopkins said in 1995, after he won the IBF middleweight title by knocking out Segundo Mercado. "I owe them a debt I can never repay because they created the tradition I've tried to live up to."

It's funny how dreams can soar with increased success. Little Donald Tramp put away his Monopoly board game one day and started building actual hotels on Boardwalk. And as the victories and prestige piled up, Bernard "The Executioner" Hopkins began to think of his place in the world beyond Broad Street.

So it came to pass that Hopkins, who became the first man ever to knock out the most popular fighter on the planet, Oscar De La Hoya, found himself at the podium of a ballroom here in the MGM Grand, looking very much like a 39-year-old kid whose trading-card heroes had suddenly come to life.

Mike Tyson was standing off to the side. Thomas Hearns and Roberto Duran were seated in an audience mostly composed of media members who now wanted to know how Hopkins thought he stacked up in comparison to such middleweight greats as Sugar Ray Robinson, Marvelous Marvin Hagler, Carlos Monzon and Jake La Motta.

Hopkins' ninth-round stoppage of De La Hoya on Saturday night extended his division record of title defenses to 19. Asked if he would consider relinquishing one of his four world championship belts if presented the opportunity for a megabucks, non-middleweight fight, Hopkins shook his head. Money is important, sure, but immortality for a lighter cannot be purchased as if it were just another pricey item on the shelf at Neiman-Marcus.

"If I have to give up a belt and not reach my goal of 20 defenses, I'd be going against what I want to do for history," said Hopkins, who was paid a career-high $10 million to De La Hoya's $27 million.

"When my daughter, who's 5 years old now, becomes a teenager and somebody tells her about her daddy, they're not going to talk about money. They're going to talk about history and how great of a fighter he was. That lives way after I'm dead. That's important to Bernard Hopkins."

When that stranger's conversation with Latrice Hopkins does take place at some future date, it almost surely will include a reference to the signature punch landed during her father's career in the ring — a short left hook to the body that left the "Golden Boy" crumpled on the canvas like a discarded Styrofoam cup.

Through eight mostly tactical rounds that had not followed the expected script, Hopkins (45-2-1, 32 KOs) had built a comfortable points lead by controlling the flow of the action. But he hadn't delivered many fireworks and, well, the most breathlessly anticipated middleweight matchup since Sugar Ray Leonard upset Hagler in 1987 was in danger of becoming as lackluster as your typical Super Bowl.

But Hopkins' 76-year-old Yoda of a trainer, Bouie Fisher, spotted something in De La Hoya (37-4, 29 KOs) he thought his guy could take advantage of. So, following the seventh round, he instructed Hopkins to look for an opening to hook to the body off the jab.

As brilliant revelations go, it was on par with Albert Einstein giving us E=mc2. Hopkins came out for the ninth round, fired a jab, and delivered a shot just under De La Hoya's ribcage that an HBO analyst admiringly described as "chopped liver" and Hopkins added, "with Hopkins sauce on it."

"I set him up with the jab, leaned to the left and hit him in the liver," Hopkins said. "The left hook made him say, 'Ughhh!' I heard the wind come out of him."

De La Hoya collapsed, his face a mask of pain. Try as he might, he couldn't pull himself to his feet before referee Kenny Bayless reached the count of 10.

"He caught me right on the button," said De La Hoya, the 1992 Olympic gold medalist from East Los Angeles who went off as a 2-1 underdog, his first experience as a longshot. "Believe me, I tried getting up. I have what it takes to get up.

"I know it's hard to knock me out. Never in my wildest dreams did I think I'd get stopped by a body shot. But he landed a great, great shot and stopped me. What can I say? He's the middleweight champion of the world."

At the time of the knockout, which came after an elapsed time of 1 minute, 38 seconds, Hopkins led by margins of 79-73 and 78-74 on the scorecards submitted, respectively, by judges Dave Moretti and Paul Smith. Keith Macdonald, taking the minority viewpoint, had De La Hoya ahead, 77-75.

In adding De La Hoya's WBO middleweight championship to the WBC, WBA and IBF titles he already held, Hopkins becomes the first fighter to take simultaneous possession of belts from the four most widely recognized sanctioning bodies. Since the WBC is the lead organization for Hopkins' next defense, his celebration of No. 20 could be a mandatory against the WBC's No. 1 contender, England's Howard Eastman. Hopkins also might request an exemption to go after a bigger-name opponent, possibly the winner of the Oct. 2 bout between Felix Trinidad, whom he's already defeated, and Ricardo Mayorga.

After that, Hopkins — who turns 40 on Jan. 15 — could move up in weight to challenge WBC light-heavyweight champion Antonio Tarver or the man he's chased since 1993, Roy Jones Jr. Jones handed Hopkins his last defeat 11 years ago, and it left an aftertaste that has lingered in his mouth like that of a tainted cheesesteak.

"I'm not a light-heavyweight," conceded Hopkins, who weighed a taut 156 pounds for De La Hoya. "Do I put myself at great risk to do something that I know my body can't carry? I got to think hard about that.

"I do want big fights. I need big fights. But I'm going to be smart about it."

Minutemen trying to jell

UMass faces UNH today

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team has done one thing right all year. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, it's either offense or defense, never both.

After going 2-2 during its current five-game home stand, UMass is set to face the Wildcats of New Hampshire (1-1-3) today in its last game at Rudd Field until Atlantic 10 rival comes to town on October 15.

The Minutemen (2-4-0, 0-0-0 A-10) have had trouble with their consistency so far this season and are looking to get both offense and defense on the same page. Recently, it's been the offense that has been picking up the slack, scoring eight goals over the last three games.

UMass coach Sam Koch is concerned about his defense and is looking for the unit to literally get on the ball.

"We're not closing down our man quick enough and we're not staying with our men as far as man-to-man marking in areas where we need to," Koch said. "Every now and then we get caught sleeping, and when we have that happen we get punished."

As if the defense (which has given up seven goals in the last three games), needed any more hardships, the Minutemen won't

Twins keep running

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

CHICAGO (AP) — Nothing fazes the Minnesota Twins.

Threatened with contraction three years ago, they ran away with the AL Central title. In disarray at the All-Star break last year, they regrouped and won the division again. And 2004? This might just be the most improbable run of them all.

Forced by economics to replace half of the team, then riddled with injuries, the Twins should have been out of contention two months ago. Instead, they're making room at the Metrodome for another AL Central trophy after clinching Monday night and getting ready for the third straight trip to the playoffs, a first in the team's 44-year history.

"No matter what you throw at us, we're going to try and bob and weave," said Torii Hunter, one of the players left from the contraction team. "We might get hit every once in a while, but we're going to try and bob and weave, try to make do and try to stay alive. I think that's what's keeping us going and proving a lot of people wrong."

It's one thing for the New York Yankees or Atlanta Braves to win year after year. The Braves have one of the most stable organizations in the big leagues, with Bobby Cox the manager since 1990 and John Schuerholz in his 14th season as general manager. The Yankees have more money than some small countries, allowing them to build a star-studded lineup and go after any player they want.

But the Twins? They put the "small" in "small-market team." Their payroll at the start of the year was $53.585 million, less than a third of what the Yankees were spending. Their highest-paid player, Brad Radke, will earn $10.75 million this season, which doesn't even crack the top 25 in the list of biggest paychecks.

It's not as if the Twins can count on continuity, either. They lost Eddie Guardado, LaTroy Hawkins, A.J. Pierzynski, Eric Milton, Dustan Mohr, Denny Hocking and Kenny Rogers in the offseason, and then traded Doug Mientkiewicz in July.

Losing that kind of talent would make most teams want to curl up in their clubhouses and wait for spring training.

Not the Twins.

"We really don't think about all those things," manager Ron Gardenhire said. "It's not like we sit around and go, 'Wow, let's show 'em.' We just go out and play. We go out and have some fun, and we've got good players."

While the Twins have managed to keep a core of key veterans — Hunter, Radke, Jacque Jones, Corey Koskie, Shannon Stewart — who can show the newcomers the Minnesota way, general manager Terry Ryan also has shown a knack for finding the right people to fill his holes.

Joe Nathan was a former starter who had one career save when the Twins acquired him from San Francisco in the Pierzynski trade. Now he ranks third in the American League with 43 saves, blowing only three all year.

Johan Santana has gone from a little-known member of the bullpen last season to a favorite for the AL Cy Young Award. He's won his last 11 starts and leads the league in ERA (2.65) and strikeouts (254).

And young players who come up through the Minnesota farm system get an early introduction into what Gardenhire and the Twins expect. The Twins bring a lot of minor leaguers — coaches and players — to spring training so everyone in the entire organization can be on the same page. What Gardenhire does with his club is no different than what's done at Double-A New Britain.

"It has to be the whole system," Gardenhire said. "It can't just be one level, it has to be everywhere. And we've got a pretty good system going here where everybody talks about the same thing."

That hasn't gone unnoticed by the opposition.

Minutewomen win first game of season

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team's quest for its first victory of the season ended yesterday in New Britain, Connecticut. The Minutewomen toppled the Central Connecticut State Blue Devils 3-2 on the road to break into the win column.

UMass (1-5, 0-1-0 A-10) got on the scoreboard first, registering two goals in the first 15 minutes of play. Junior Adair Blyler put the Minutewomen ahead 12 minutes into the contest off of an assist from senior Lindsey Fairweather.

A minute and a half later Fairweather gave UMass a two-goal cushion. Junior midfielder Lindsey Bellini set up Fairweather's goal on a cross to the front of the net. Fairweather was able to get the back of her foot onto the ball and send it into the goal.

Central Connecticut State (4-4) pulled to within a goal with 23:51 left in the first half, on a goal by leading scorer Jess McCavanagh. McCavanagh pushed the ball in after UMass keeper Kristin Walker mishandled a cross from Kari Mancini.

The Blue Devils notched the equalizer with 10:28 to go in the half on freshmen Heather Spada's first career goal. Spada headed in a corner kick by Sophie Hopper to tie the game at two.

With five minutes remaining in the half, freshmen Jenny Roehrig recorded the game-winner for the Maroon and White. Roehrig let loose a blast from 25-yards out just over the goalkeeper's hands and into the top right corner of the net. The goal was the second in as many games for Roehrig.

The rest of the game resulted in no goals, but was filled with intense and physical play as evidenced by the teams combining for 33 fouls.

"That was a playoff-level game," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "The second half was very intense and physical."

The Minutewomen had opportunities to expand on their lead in the second half, but were unable to do so.

"We kept the pressure on in the second half," Rudy said. "We could have scored another goal or two, but nothing was uncontested."

UMass out shot CCSU 20-16 for the game, but had many more scoring threats, as 11 of the Minutewomen's shots were on goal as opposed to only five for the Blue Devils.

The Minutewomen thwarted CCSU's last real threat with a little help from the crossbar. With 13 minutes to play, Hopper unleashed a shot from 20-yards out that hit off the post and was cleared out of the area by the UMass defense.

Central Connecticut State presented a difficult challenge to the UMass defense because they run a unique offense. The Blue Devils' roster contains five Europeans and they play a distinct English style of play. The Minutewomen were able to slow the offensive attack in part because of their strong play on air balls.

Rudy credited the defensive efforts of junior Amy Maffucci and freshmen Tina Rodriguez and Christina Nunes for keeping the Blue Devils at bay in the second half.

This game was the first of the season in which UMass got substantial contributions from its returning players, as well as continued strong play from the large core of freshmen.

Rudy was also pleased with the performance Blyler turned in. The team's leading scorer from a year ago had been off to a slow start this season, but was a major factor in yesterday's win.

"Blyler was running all over the field making plays for us," Rudy said.

The Minutewomen must now turn their attention to the upcoming Atlantic-10 conference schedule. Rudy said he hopes the team will build off this victory and get rolling.

"Now they know how to win which is important," Rudy added.

Cyclist claims innocence

By Naomi Koppel
Associated Press

REGENSDORF, Switzerland (AP) — Olympic time-trial champion Tyler Hamilton declared his innocence Tuesday after his pro cycling team said he's being investigated for possible blood doping and could be stripped of his gold medal.

Hamilton said he would "fight this until I don't have a euro left in my pocket."

Tests at the Athens Olympics on Aug. 19 and at the Spanish Vuelta on Sept. 11 showed evidence of blood from another person, cycling's governing body said, according to a spokesman for Hamilton's team, Phonak. Follow-up tests were scheduled for later Tuesday.

Phonak spokesman Georges Luedinger said Hamilton denied having a transfusion — which can boost an athlete's performance by increasing the amount of oxygen-transporting red blood cells in his system.

"Tyler told us he did nothing," Luedinger said.

If found guilty of a violation at the Olympics, Hamilton would lose his gold. Three athletes had gold medals revoked for doping during the Aug. 13-29 games.

"I am 100 percent innocent," Hamilton said.

Former world champion Oscar Camenzind was fired by Phonak and announced his retirement after testing positive for the performance-enhancing substance EPO shortly before the Olympics.

A record 24 athletes — none American — from various sports were cited for drug-test violations

UMass celebrates Autumnal Equinox

Crowds gather at Sunwheel for sunrise

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

At the time when most people were waking up, a small group of University of Massachusetts students and Amherst residents gathered yesterday at the UMass Sunwheel to watch the sunrise in celebration of the Autumnal Equinox with Doctor Judith Young of the UMass Astronomy department.

Later, an even larger group gathered to watch the sunset. At both sunrise and sunset, Young directed a presentation about the phases of the sun and moon and the stones of the Sunwheel.

"This is one of only two days a year when the sun truly rises due east and sets due west," she said. "You could see this sight from anywhere on earth except the north and south poles."

Young said a guest once described the Autumnal Equinox as "a sort of international unity day."

To the guests at the sunrise watch, Young pointed out the gray at the edge of the western hemisphere, explaining that it was the Earth's shadow projected on the atmosphere. She also directed the guests' attention to the spreading light and shadows on the distant mountains, before the shadows began to stretch from the rocks at sunrise.

Young explained that viewers would not see the sun rise at exactly due east from the Amherst Sunwheel because the sun rises at an angle and trees and hills block the point in the east where the sun rose. Onlookers had to wait until the sun broke the edge of the trees for their view of the last sunrise of summer.

For those who attended the sunset watch, Young talked about what made the Autumnal equinox special, such as the fact that the amount of night and day is exactly equal and that, at the equator, a person would cast no shadow at noon.

Young, who has been doing presentations at the Sunwheel since 1997, then showed pictures of past sunrises, sunsets and phases of the sky, while explaining what one would see in the sky in different seasons.

When asked why she wanted to set the Sunwheel stones up, Young explained that she learned about the rise and set of the sun from her study of the Anasazi Indians.

"How wonderful to learn something from ancient astronomers, it's a tradition that's passed down and that's amazing."

Young, who recently visited Stonehenge, says that studying the Sunwheel, "connects us to the past."

Alyssa O'Malley and Joelle Vautour, environmental science majors who attended the sunrise, were impressed.

"It was cool," said O'Malley. Vautour agreed, saying, "It's great that someone cares enough to do all this."

Christopher Mira, a geoscience major, has been attending several viewings at the Sunwheel for the past two years, ever since he learned of the Sunwheel's existence from his astronomy class.

"It gives you a good perspective of life beyond the material world," he said. "It's the true experience of existence."

One Amherst man asked about the risk of the 500-ton rocks sinking into the wet land. Young said because of the care taken in the foundation and setting the stones, "the people who helped me put all this together assure me that the Sunwheel will be standing for 5,000 years."

Steven Buczowski, an astrophysicist, even brought his young daughter to the event. He said he wanted to "try and educate her about natural science and the ways of the world."

Amherst resident Sam Skillings was also enthusiastic about seeing the sun rise and set. He had read about Stonehenge as a child and watched as the Sunwheel was built.

"I just never got around to coming until today. It actually fell on my birthday today so I thought it was a good time for me to come see this," he said. "Getting my wife out of bed this morning was the hardest part."

The same event also takes place today at 6:00 p.m. for a sunset viewing.

Speaker Higgins contests alleged election problems

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Patrick Higgins, speaker of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association, denied rumors yesterday that Senate elections slated for next Wednesday and Thursday would be held in the Campus Center rather than in the Dining Commons.

Speaker Higgins claimed that elections will undoubtedly be held in all of the Dining Commons as well as in the Campus Center and that there will be professional staff and student volunteers present to assist in the voting process.

According to fellow Coordinating Council member Pavel Payano and Secretary of Press and Relations Jeffrey Napolitano, the polling locations for the election is questionable because an elections commission has not yet been appointed and those commissioners would be vital to the election process.

"I was surprised with Napolitano's and Payano's comments," Speaker Higgins said. "We have a professional staff coming from student affairs and students. All DCs will be open."

In order to become an elections commissioner, one has to be approved by the Governor. At the beginning of this academic year, Speaker Higgins thought that there was a complete staff.

"We weren't concerned that we didn't have a full commission, because they [present election commissioners] were people from last year," he said. "It wasn't until we started making phone calls that people backed out."

Speaker Higgins stated that

Dukakis featured in lecture series

By Jeremy Dirac
Collegian Correspondent

Former Massachusetts Governor and 1988 Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis will speak at the Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall today at 4 p.m.

The non-partisan Center for Public Policy and Administration will feature Dukakis as part of the CPPA's "Distinguished Lecture Series." Following the event, Dukakis will receive a Public Service Award.

"Michael Dukakis presided as Governor over some difficult budgetary times at the University as well as some good ones in his last administration," said CPPA Director John Hird. "He is being honored as an exemplary public leader — and a man of high personal and professional integrity who has devoted his entire life to public service."

In his talk "The Uninsured: 44 Million and Counting", Dukakis will be speaking on the issue of health care in America.

Durfee Conservatory hosts second annual benefit today

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts' best-kept secret, the Durfee Conservatory, is hosting its Second Annual Benefit Concert today from 5 to 9 p.m. among its very own gardens. Coordinators Armand Prevost, the conservatory's interim director, and Sam Krentzman, a junior Chinese Language and Literature major at UMass, have scheduled rock, blue grass, Irish, funk, and folk bands to perform, such as Busted Vacuum, Rudy Brown, Northern Aggression, Sam, JD, and Bob, and The Chicken Stand Throw Down Band from New York. Also present will be Earth Foods, the student-run vegetarian collective.

Although the Durfee Conservatory is located near the Central residence area and only a building away from Franklin Dining Hall, it still manages to have an inconspicuous location. It is so inconspicuous that it might be possible for a student to graduate from UMass never having known the pleasure of this weekday retreat and arboretum.

"Durfee is the heart of the school," said Kretzman. "It's been around since the founding. It's like an oasis for students, a haven in the middle of the daily grind, a small Garden of Eden."

Apart from the benefit concert, the Durfee Conservatory, founded in 1867 and named after Trustee Dr. Nathan Durfee, has a lot to offer. Visitors will find inviting benches, a bamboo grove, 130-year-old bonzai trees, vegetable gardens, and a charming pond complete with carp and a bridge to admire. If that's not enough of an attraction, visitors might enjoy the company of its two adorable kittens.

The first benefit concert was prompted last year, when like many departments of the University, the Durfee Conservatory suffered budget cuts. Last year's concert featured DJ Nondeskript from WMUA and bands such as Busted Vacuum, Baker Baby Makers, and Death Amphetamine.

Although it attracted several hundred people, Kretzman says last year's concert only raised a total of $400. This year, coordinators hope to raise a total of $1,000 through a combination of $5 "suggested donation" ticket sales, contributions from local businesses and a raffle or auction.

Kretzman urges students to attend "to really immerse yourself in what UMass is — a school in touch with the land."

The rain date for the event is Sept. 30.

Lecture series kicks off 50th anniversary of Brown v. Board

Professor Charles Payne is the first speaker in a series of lectures commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Brown v. Board of Education decision.

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Correspondent

The History department at the University of Massachusetts will be debuting the first part in a series of free lectures entitled "Race, Law, and Civil Rights: Fifty Years of Brown v. Board of Education" today. The series commemorates the 50th anniversary of the landmark Brown v. Board of Education Supreme Court case.

Charles Payne, a Professor of African-American studies, history and sociology at Duke University will present the first section, "The Whole United States is Southern!: Brown v. Board of Education and the Mystification of Race" on Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in the Flavin Auditorium, Room 137 of the Isenberg School of Management.

"The intention of this event is to bring together the University and community together on Brown v. Board of Education and to make people aware of the changes it caused," said Carl H. Nightingale, associate professor of history and coordinator of program events.

The lecture program is being funded by 1967 UMass graduate Kenneth R. Feinberg and his family and friends. The program is also made possible in part by the UMass College of Humanities and Fine Arts, the Department of Afro-American Studies, the Department of Women's Studies, the Department Legal Studies, the Center for Public Policy and Administration, the Political Economy Research Institute and the Sports Management Department.

Feinberg was an assistant United States attorney in the Southern District of New York in the 1970s. He also served on Special Counsel, and the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary from 1975 to 1978. From 1977 to 1979, he served as an administrative aide to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

"The UMass History Department commends Feinberg," said Gerald W. McFarland, professor of history and director of undergraduate studies. "He's truly an amazing individual whose professionalism has repeatedly been recognized through appointments to major public service posts.

"He also retains strong ties with UMass and the professorship that he and his family and friends have endowed for the purpose of examining how the study of history illuminates contemporary public policy issues is an outstanding example of his support for education at UMass Amherst."

Feinberg-lecturer Charles Payne is the author of many works, including "Getting What We Ask For; The Ambiguity of Success and Failure In Urban

British hostage appears on Web site video weeping

By Kim Housego
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A British hostage appeared on a video posted on an Islamic Web site Wednesday weeping and pleading for his life as Iraq's leader and U.S. officials crushed reports that a high-profile female Iraqi weapons scientist could be released from jail soon — as demanded by the kidnappers.

The captive, Kenneth Bigley, appealed to British Prime Minister Tony Blair to intervene. "I think this is possibly my last chance," he said. "I don't want to die."

Bigley was being held by a militant group led by Jordanian-born terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The group has already beheaded Americans Eugene Armstrong and Jack Hensley, whom it abducted along with Bigley from the Westerners' Baghdad home last week.

On Wednesday, the group also posted a video of Hensley's killing on the Internet, as it had two days earlier of Armstrong's beheading. Hensley's decapitated body was found Wednesday in Baghdad.

The gruesome hostage drama played out as fighting raged on in Iraq, killing three U.S. soldiers and wounding four others.

Suicide attackers struck key diplomatic and commercial centers of the capital, and American tanks and troops searching for weapons stormed into the Sadr City slum, a stronghold of Shiite militants, only to come under a barrage of mortar and automatic weapons fire. The violence across Baghdad left at least 17 Iraqis dead and 100 injured and underscored the inability of U.S. and Iraqi forces to bring security to even the most vital areas of the capital.

U.S. and Iraqi troops battled with insurgents in the central city of Samarra, where U.S. forces had earlier claimed success against militants waging a 17-month insurgency, police said. At least one child was killed and five people wounded in the fighting, police said.

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

An image from a videotape posted on an Islamic website Wednesday, shows British hostage Kenneth Bigley, pleading for his life.

The confusion over the fate of female detainees began when a Justice Ministry official announced that Rihab Rashid Taha, a scientist who became known as "Dr. Germ" for helping Iraq make weapons out of anthrax, would be freed in the coming days because she was no longer a threat to national security.

The U.S. and Iraqi officials found themselves at odds over who had custody over Taha and another female scientist involved in Saddam Hussein's biological weapons programs, with Iraqi national security adviser Qassim Daoud saying they were in the hands of Iraqi security forces and that "Iraqi judges decided to release them because they didn't have any evidence."

But a U.S. Embassy spokesman disagreed, saying the pair "are in our legal and physical custody."

Prime Minister Ayad Allawi told The Associated Press that his government has begun reviewing the status of its detainees, including the two female scientists.

But he said the review process had nothing to do with the current hostage situation and had started weeks ago in Iraq.

"We have not been negotiating and we will not negotiate with terrorists on the release of hostages," he said in a telephone interview from New York. "No release takes place unless I authorize it."

The conflicting U.S. and Iraqi statements raised questions over who has authority in the country, even after the handover of sovereignty to Allawi's interim government in June. U.S. officials have been saying that they have been giving more decision-making power to Iraqis, including over security matters.

Teenage Palestinian suicide bomber kills two policemen

By Pete Enav
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) — A Palestinian teenager blew herself up at a busy Jerusalem bus station Wednesday, killing two Israeli policemen who stopped her for a security check and wounding 16 bystanders in an attack that evaded Israel's clampdown on the West Bank for the Jewish holidays.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, meanwhile, dropped a plan to evacuate 21 Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip simultaneously at the beginning of next year, reverting to an earlier formula — a staged pullout in the summer of 2005.

That prompted Secretary of State Colin Powell to say Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia — and not Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat — should be empowered to take control of Gaza. Arafat "is not able to act in this manner," Powell said Wednesday. Israel and the United States are boycotting Arafat, the head of the Palestinian Authority.

Sharon also hinted that Israel might one day assassinate Arafat, as it did with two leaders of the Islamic militant group Hamas responsible for scores of suicide bombings.

The Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent group with ties to Arafat's Fatah movement, claimed responsibility for Wednesday's bombing, but it was unclear what would trigger an Israeli move to assassinate Arafat. Israel has not carried out earlier threats despite attacks with dozens of casualties.

The blast at a busy intersection in the French Hill neighborhood of northern Jerusalem destroyed a nearby police post, leaving shards of glass in the road as the smell of burning rubber wafted in the air.

The Al Aqsa brigades identified the bomber as Zainab Abu Salem, 19, from the Askar refugee camp near the West Bank city of Nablus.

A group member in Nablus told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity that Zainab volunteered for a suicide attack, saying she wanted to avenge Palestinian militants killed recently by Israeli troops in Nablus.

"She said that if we refused, she would attack an army post with a knife," the Al Aqsa member said. "So we organized quickly. We set up the attack within 17 hours and we chose this site in Jerusalem because we know it."

Her father, Ali Abu Salem, 48, collapsed and his wife, Sahar, wailed at the news of their daughter's attack.

"Why? Why is this happening to us?" Sahar asked.

Police said two border guards at the bus stop spotted the young woman carrying a bag and asked her to open it. She refused, and then detonated as much as 11 pounds of explosives inside.

"I just heard this loud explosion and people started yelling, 'Terrorist! Terrorist!'" said Freda Amsalem, 40, from the nearby West Bank settlement of Maaleh Adumim. "Why do they do this to us? Why do they do this to innocent people? They're destroying families. Enough!"

Amsalem was not injured.

The bombing came two days before the holiest day on the Jewish calendar — the fast of Yom Kippur — and at a time of heightened police presence nationwide. Israel clamped down on the West Bank last week at the start of the Jewish New Year's holiday, banning Palestinians from entering the country.

Former governor Dukakis to speak at Bowker today

Dukakis says that he likes presidential candidate John Kerry and his working to get him elected. He says that "there is no comparison" between Kerry's health care plan — which he favors — and Bush's.

In comparing President George W. Bush with his father, George Bush senior, Dukakis said: "He's [George W. Bush] far more conservative. He's surrounded by ideologues ... they're far more dangerous."

Dukakis says that health care is an important issue, which he plans to discuss in greater depth today.

Hird said that students should be interested in the issue of health care. "One reason health care is so important is the rapid escalation in health care costs in the U.S. The U.S. spends more of its prodigious resources on health care than any other nation, and cost increases are forcing policymakers to confront difficult choices in financing Medicaid and Medicare. There are more than 44 nilllion other reasons why health care is so important this year; the number of people without health care insurance."

Dukakis says he is often referred to as a "liberal," but does not know what the current definition of liberal is. He says that he understands the word "conservative" to mean someone who is "careful with their money." However, he feels that the fiscally conservative party these days is the Democratic Party.

Dukakis has no plans to return to public office. "Not if I want to stay married," he said.

The organizer of Thursday's event, Wendy Varner, expects "a full house." The location was chosen because "Bowker Auditorium is the perfect venue for an interactive presentation and discussion," stated Varner.

There will be a short reception after the talk. The event is free of admission and open to the public.

Experts offer estimate on time of death for Laci Peterson's fetus

By Brian Skoloff
Associated Press

Laci Peterson's parents, Sharon Rocha, left, and Ron Grantski, right, prepare to enter the San Mateo County Courthouse in Redwood City, Calif. yesterday.

REDWOOD CITY, Calif. (AP) — Laci Peterson's fetus likely died around Dec. 23, 2002, a day before the pregnant schoolteacher was reported missing, an expert testified Wednesday in the murder trial of her husband.

Prosecutors allege that Scott Peterson killed his wife on or around Dec. 24, 2002, in their Modesto home, then dumped her body into the bay.

Her remains and that of her fetus washed up in April 2003, not far from the marina where he launched his boat on Christmas Eve for what he claims was a solo fishing trip.

Peterson's lawyers maintain someone else abducted and killed Laci.

Dr. Greggory DeVore, an expert in fetal medicine, said he was asked by prosecutors to examine Laci's medical records and bones taken from the dead fetus to help determine when it died.

The age of the fetus is important because prosecutors claim it was expelled dead from Laci's decaying corpse. Defense lawyers maintain the baby was born alive after Laci vanished, proving that her husband could not be the killer given the baby's due date of Feb. 10.

The coroner who performed the autopsy on the fetus estimated its age at death to be about nine months, or full term. A forensic anthropologist testified previously that the fetus' age was between 33 and 38 weeks.

DeVore said the Dec. 23 death date for the fetus was an average taken from several different examinations. The fetus could have also died on Dec. 21 or Dec. 24, he said. He estimated the fetus' age at its time of death to be about 33 weeks and one day.

DeVore never physically examined Laci Peterson before her death.

On cross-examination, defense lawyer Mark Geragos quickly pointed out the "varying results" from different doctors regarding the age of the fetus, and noted DeVore's opinions were simply based on averages and estimates.

"We know that two out of three of these calculations are wrong, is that correct?" Geragos asked, noting that Laci Peterson's baby was still alive when she visited her doctor on Dec. 23.

DeVore agreed but defended his estimates.

Geragos also noted to the obviously flustered DeVore that a test using another scientific method would indicate the fetus died on Dec. 28.

On Tuesday, Modesto police Detective Craig Grogan said police had more than enough reason to suspect Scott Peterson was involved in his pregnant wife's disappearance, and that her body lay somewhere in San Francisco Bay.

Grogan ticked off the list of reasons in rapid succession providing jurors with the first detailed narrative of the murder case against Peterson in the 17-week trial. Grogan's account had jurors leaning forward in their seats, scribbling notes.

Speaker Higgins says he will not be viewed as the SGA's 'next Jared Nokes' commissioners decided not to renew their positions for a variety of reasons, not just one particular instance.

"Some said they had no time, and I don't blame them," he said. "They were burnt out from running two elections last spring."

Speaker Higgins says he is exceptionally pleased with the opportunities that this year's Senate elections will provide to the students. In an unprecedented decision, voting will take place over the course of two days — Sept. 29-30 — rather than just one. He said he hopes that this will give students more of an opportunity to cast their votes.

The Speaker also noted that there are more nominees for Senate than last year.

"There are twelve more names on the ballot this year," he said, "there are 97 names this year."

Speaker Higgins says he greatly disagrees with the statements of Napolitano and Payano in yesterday's Collegian, claiming that the allegations and statements were completely false.

"I'm hoping that we can rise above this," he said, "I want a successful senate and I feel like there is a lack of trust. People get bogged down with your agendas and their agendas."

Speaker Higgins fears that people will view him as the "Jared Nokes of last year."

Nokes, the former president of the SGA was highly criticized for not recognizing the seats of the ALANA Caucus. ALANA is the on-campus diversity group that insisted that its seats on the Senate be recognized by the president.

Speaker Higgins, like Nokes, also does not want to recognize the appointed ALANA Caucus seats but he said that he is ready to move on if it is going to create problems like last year.

"My belief is that they [ALANA seats] shouldn't be a part of Coordinating Council, but I am recognizing them now out of good faith. I'm not looking for another year of fighting."

Speaker Higgins chose this past not to recognize the seats because they are not recognized in the Senate; and he claims that the Coordinating Council acts like the Senate over summer break and that they shouldn't be recognized.

"We were just setting ourselves up for a light that wasn't worth it, we'll deal with it internally and the seats will be recognized," he said.

Speaker Higgins, who has not spoken to Payano or Napolitano is worried about the situations because he doesn't want to give students the wrong message about SGA.

"Bottom line the SGA is doing more this year and we want the students involved, hopefully we're going to put this behind us."

In a memo that Payano sent to Speaker Higgins yesterday, he expressed much opposition and anger towards the Speaker's priorities and objectives.

"Given that you had no successful session during June, July and August, and only one in September, I am inclined to wonder what exactly you did all summer," Payano stated in the letter.

In addition, Payano claimed that since Speaker Higgins was elected last May, he has not done a sufficient job.

"I don't know when you became aware of the problem regarding our lack of election commissioners, but it would have been useful to have had this knowledge during the summer. At this point, according to the by-laws, we are unable to fill those positions, though we could have done so, if Coordinating Council had met to appoint the Chancellor of Elections sooner," he said in the memo.

Both Napolitano and Payano were unable to be contacted after Speaker Higgins's comments to The Daily Collegian.

Maker of Twinkies files for bankruptcy

By David Twiddy

Twinkies await sale on a shelf in a Wonder Bread Outlet store in Kansas City, Mo. Makers blame recent high-protein, low-carb diet crazes for a drop in sales.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Interstate Bakeries Corp., the maker of lunch box staples Wonder Bread and Twinkies, filed for bankruptcy Wednesday after months of financial turmoil brought on in part by the low-carb craze.

"The nation's largest wholesale baker filed for Chapter 11 reorganization and installed new management, saying it intended to survive. The company will continue operating its bakeries, outlet stores and distribution centers, and analysts said that its famous brands are unlikely to disappear from store shelves.

Tony Alvarez, the head of turnaround firm Alvarez & Marsal and the baker's new chief executive, said the company had no immediate plans to lay off additional workers. But, he added, "It's very rare in this country that anyone goes through Chapter 11 and is layoff-free."

For more than a year, Interstate Bakeries has struggled with declining sales of its bread and sweet goods products, a drop the company and analysts blame on the popularity of high-protein, low-carb diets such as Atkins and South Beach.

Thomas Morabito, a food analyst at Longbow Research in Cleveland, said the company was hurt by what he called a "lack of innovation" in responding to the low-carb market; it didn't release a low-carb product until February.

He said the diet trend, combined with the company's high debt and large overhead costs, led to the filing.

"I think the low-carb phenomenon was just a final blow to IBC," Morabito said.

The Kansas City-based company listed assets of $1.6 billion and liabilities of $1.3 billion in its court filings. In those filings, it said chairman and CEO James Elsesser had resigned effective Wednesday.

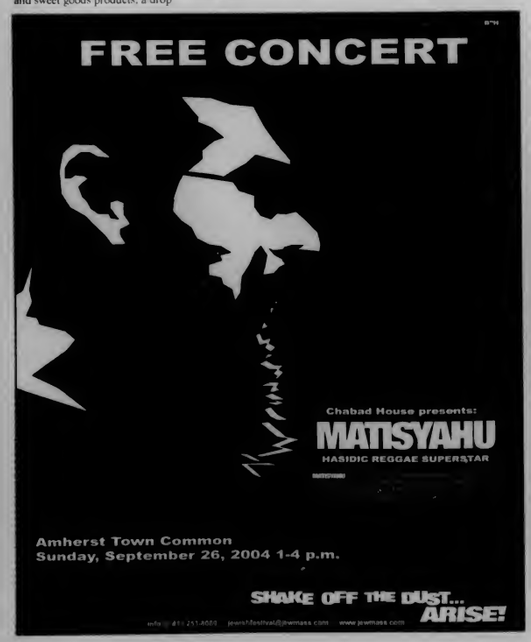
Satisfaction reported by health advisers for meningitis shot

By Diedtra Henderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Federal health advisers said Wednesday that they were satisfied with the safety and effectiveness of a longer-lasting vaccine against bacterial meningitis, which is especially deadly among otherwise healthy teenagers and young adults.

But additional study will be needed to watch for any unexpected complications that could arise when the vaccine reaches a wider population, advisers to the Food and Drug Administration said.

The vaccine Menactra is manufactured by Aventis Pasteur to protect against the A, C, Y and W-135 strains of bacteria that cause meningococcal diseases. The vaccine, being considered for people ages 11 to 55, still needs approval from the FDA. The agency often follows its advisers' recommendations but is not bound by them.



More than 500,000 cases of meningococcal disease occur each year in the world, causing 135,000 deaths. Up to 15 percent of survivors have long-term problems, including mental disability, loss of hearing and paralysis. In the United States, there are fewer than 3,000 cases of invasive meningococcal disease per year, according to the CDC.

The bacterial ailment, which causes inflammation of the spinal cord and the fluid surrounding the brain, strikes young otherwise healthy people. Americans ages 15-24 suffer the highest mortality rates. The Centers for Disease Control favors routine immunizations for all adolescents as well as college freshmen living in dorms.

Freshmen crowded in college dorms can have lifestyles that combine risk factors: living in close contact, smoking cigarettes and hopping from bar to bar. Those living in such close quarters are more than twice as likely to become infected by meningitis as other freshmen.

In six years of testing by Aventis Pasteur, a single dose of Menactra showed enough power to protect students all through their college years. Compared to the current vaccine, Menactra proved as capable of boosting immune response 28 days after the patients enrolled in clinical trials got their shots. But the new vaccine, which would cost $80 per shot, provided longer-term immune system protection that persisted three years after the first immunization, when protection from the current vaccine had worn off.

That means fewer booster shots are necessary.

What storms may come

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

Bonnie, Charley, Frances, Ivan. Who would have ever suspected these seemingly innocuous and quotidian names in the American vernacular to be capable of the widespread havoc that they have wreaked upon the South of our nation in recent weeks? All the same, they have been sent in their apocalyptic splendor and they have extracted bitter revenge for our environmentally degrading development along the coasts of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. The skies opened as torrential wind and rains pounded hard like celestial hammers and massive destruction was forthcoming for days on end.

Don't let the wording fool you: this is no laughing matter. Since mid-August Hurricanes Bonnie, Charley, Frances, and Ivan have proven more than a simple blip on America's radar screen. The devastating hurricane season that annually terrorizes our Caribbean neighbors to the South and generally only brushes the southern Floridian shores seems to have migrated a bit farther North than usual this year.

What if the increased frequency in worldwide weather extremities is indicative of a larger a problem; one that has been increasingly addressed by our pop culture in the past few years?

According to David Helvarg, President of the Blue Frontier Campaign and author of the books "The War Against the Greens" and "Blue Frontier: Saving Americas Living Seas," this is not an entirely uncommon occurrence: the hemisphere generally goes through 25-40 year cycles of lesser and greater hurricane activity. The 1990s represented a lull in the sequence and the first decade of the new millennium will prove to be a rise in local hurricane activity. Why, then, is everybody in such upheaval about a perfectly natural and predictable climate shift?

"The only difference between the last period of intensified hurricanes back in the '50s and the '60s and today is massive coastal sprawls," Helvarg asserts. "We have a government report that says 25 percent of all houses within 500 feet of the ocean will be gone in the next 50 years. And yet we have a federal flood insurance system that drives the development." Gulf Shores, Ala. is the town that has borne not only the brunt of Hurricane Ivan, but also a similar category-4 storm named Frederic 25 years ago. After Frederic provided his free demolition services to the town in September, 1979, developers used federal funds to replace destroyed beach shacks with tacky, 14 story condominiums — condos that Ivan gladly smashed into glass shards and parquet splinters last week.

Ernie Smith, the director of economic development in Gulf Shores, Alabama, has long been intent upon developing the town into a tourist hotspot; he just needed a blank canvas to work with. "Ivan may move the schedule up some, but we already had ourselves a plan," Mr. Smith told the New York Times on Tuesday, referring to arrangements for a 66-acre shopping center and a corporate jet runway at the local airport. It appears that their irresponsible infrastructural development will once again be fueled by federal money.

But back to the more pressing issue of the direction of climatic change, what if Mr. Helvarg is wrong? What if the cyclical conclusion yielded by his analysis of the recent meteorological events is not as accurate as many would like to think? What if something is different this time around? What if the increased frequency in worldwide weather extremities is indicative of a larger a problem; one that has been increasingly addressed by our pop culture in the past few years?

Many will recall the summer thriller "The Day After Tomorrow" that essentially attributed the downfall of civilization as we know it to a sudden outbreak of severe climate shifts and disastrous natural disasters resulting from human-induced global warming and general environmental disregard. While the film was highly sensationalistic and accelerated in the pace that such catastrophes would actually occur, there is always, in the words of director Roland Emmerich, "something factual, something real for the audience to grab on to." At the time of release, movie promoters pointed to the February release of a Pentagon report outlining the national security threats posed by global climate change. Even so, few deemed the production sufficiently congruous with reality to warrant much concern for its core theme.

So our central question ultimately relates to whether or not the recent wave of hurricanes, as well as a plethora of other disturbing occurrences around the rest of the globe over the past few years, lends enough credence to Emmerich's doomsday ecology for us to be worried.

Lamentably, the answer is yes. For centuries we've been clearing forests, thinning phytoplankton, burning coal, oil and gas, and pouring carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases into the atmosphere faster than plants and the atmosphere can sustainably absorb them. We cannot continue to damage our home at such atrocious levels without expecting some sort of natural counter-reaction. Atmospheric carbon dioxide levels are at 20 million-year highs and 34 percent above pre-Industrial Revolution levels. In the next 100 years, global temperatures are expected to rise an average of 1.4 to 5.8 degrees Celsius per year, with the colder, polar regions warming more than equatorial areas. Many scientists now believe that within 50 years we could see the appearance of new, category-5 storms so powerful that they will redefine what we consider to be coastal.

Fortunately, not all is lost. We can help assuage much of this impending doom simply by respecting our home more than we have in the past. Subtle, everyday things like recycling, using public or non-motorized transportation, reusing plastic items, and purchasing environmentally-friendly products are all actions that we can all take without drastically altering our lifestyles. Larger political and social action is of course necessary as well, and so we should pressure our local and national representatives to demand that the US clean up its act and strengthen important international environmental legislation like the Kyoto Protocol. This is not a question of humans ruining the biosphere and rendering it forever unlivable; it is a question of changing the way we live and operate. Either we can make voluntary and gradual changes to our lifestyles now, or nature will make them for us later. If the rest of the developed world can meet ambitious environmental stringencies without ruining their economies then so can we. And, moreover, we should.

Kerry falls very short

Matthew M. Burke

I love John Kerry. I can't explain it but it's dizzying. I am the biggest John Kerry fan in the universe at this juncture in the election because he makes it so easy to discredit his ideas and his potential leadership.

This isn't even challenging anymore. Bush's foul ups are a mere footnote to Kerry's shoddy record. In an age where unprovoked butchers crash airliners into our buildings killing thousands, Kerry wants to be more sensitive in the war on terror. This comes as the terrorists savagely behead our fellow Americans.

Bush has many shortcomings and I disagree with him on many issues but Kerry will actually make us more susceptible to further attacks and that should be the number one issue come November. Over 40 countries now have or will soon have nuclear weapons. It is feasible that Al Qaeda could get their wretched hands on them. September 11 should have taught us something: never say never.

Kerry is a man who served and fought bravely in Vietnam. The Swift Boat Vets would like you to believe otherwise, but he was in fact a hero. The Swift Boat Veterans are another miserable group that has thrown its hat into the ring. Remember Moveon.org? Yes, unfortunately for Senator Kerry it works both ways. His record in Vietnam isn't enough to make him a good President.

Kerry said he threw his war medals over the fence on Pennsylvania Avenue in front of the White House. This dishonors my grandfather, who served in World War II and my great-grandfather who fought in the trenches of WWI. He later recanted his claims but this is the first example of his many infamous flip-flops. He also said he committed atrocities in Vietnam only to say, years later, that he used the wrong words to describe his actions.

Bush didn't commit atrocities. In fact he did what most of you are doing right now. He went to college and partied while there was a war raging. Not the most honorable thing, but not dishonorable. He earned a degree from Yale, so he's not as dumb as liberals think. President Bush has an honorable discharge from the Texas Air National Guard so we won't be attacking him for that either. Thanks, Mr. Rather.

You can all criticize Bush for the war in Iraq. There weren't weapons of mass destruction but Saddam's mass graves have stopped expanding.

Kerry changes his mind so much that he has no defined message or plan. He has several different ones depending on whom he is addressing. Most liberals will vote for him just to get Bush out of office. Shame on you. I say don't vote at all. Things aren't going to get better on Kerry's watch.

This election process has been a great ride. I mean, I laughed when John Edwards demanded that Bush apologize for the Swift Boat people when all along Bush has said that 527 groups should be banned. I cried when Kerry told the American people in March that he "voted for the 87 billion before he voted against it." That money was going to protect our brothers and sisters on the front lines, thanks.

You can all criticize Bush for the war in Iraq. There weren't weapons of mass destruction, but Saddam Hussein's mass graves have stopped expanding. And don't scoff because Kerry voted for the same war, remember? Then Kerry flips and flops like a fish out of water again. He later told Reuters that it was the "wrong war at the wrong time." What he really means will never be clear.

The fact of the matter is that Saddam ignored resolutions for a decade or more and the United Nations threatened with "serious consequences" if he did not comply with numerous resolutions which we all know that he did not. The U.N. failed and that is why we are in Iraq.

Kerry plans on raising taxes, which is simply not acceptable. In the Senate he voted 98 times to raise taxes. This came to a little over two trillion dollars. My father is the soul provider for my family and also a small business owner. If Kerry is elected then the tax hike will cripple what little progress he has been able to make in this economy that started it's descent before Bush came into office. The economy is rebounding and a tax hike will not help.

Kerry also has a four-point plan for Iraq. In brief he wants to share contracts with other nations to get a few more foreign boots on the ground, train Iraqi troops, create jobs and boost their economy through the selling of Iraqi oil. He is also seeking U.N. support for Iraq's upcoming elections. The Bush campaign responded to his plan several days ago, "We are already doing that," they said.

With the first debate in Miami on Sept. 30, everyone should listen to what Kerry says when he is forced to explain himself for his record and for his future plans. You'll hear a misguided man with an unclear vision of America. Bush may not be perfect but he goes to bat for his people instead of trying to please the entire world at the expense of those very same people's safety.

A divine lack

Elizabeth Carter

Times they are changing, but people, I don't know about them. I refer not to individuals, but rather to mankind on a whole. We build, we destroy, we laugh, we cry, we do, and then we quickly forget. Time passes and points each age differently, different clothes, different music, and different points of view. But there is one thing, one despairing desire and seemingly innate drive that grips the heart and core within each of us (albeit to varying degrees) that time and poor memory seemingly cannot do away with. What else could I be referring to, but the search (and often substitution) for some sort of divine force in this universe? And I say divine force, because I feel that the word "God" has practically no meaning, and that happened the day we made a profound idea into a man, yet I digress.

No one can deny that at some point in their existence this question has in some way plagued them. The hows and the whys of this silly little world we all love or despise, inevitably lead back to it. Yet, asking questions without any answers hurts and confuses. With time and disappointment many of us give up on asking the questions no one can answer.

We accept our inevitable fate of never knowing, and we march on, heads down dancing to the beat of a drum whose player most have accepted that we will never know. Yet is it possible that in our modern culture this innate drive towards divinity, when left unsatisfied in the tangible world has found a way to transmute itself into it? We don't know the divine, but we all seek it. We don't find the divine, so we ignore it. We pay worship to other things (Sports anyone?). We find other outlets for this drive that we are so desperately trying to ignore. For each man/woman, the question is asked and never answered, yet it always finds an outlet.

We accept our inevitable fate of never knowing and we march on, heads down dancing to the beat of a drum whose player most have accepted we'll never know.

In our glittery, interconnected Global society, it seems that many, much like the Greeks and Romans before us, we have found a more personal, a more real and a more human source for this lack of the divine. In absence of a God to imitate, it seems many in our society and across the world, choose to imitate our own Greek Gods of the day. We talk the way they talk, dress the way they dress, we even try to eat the way they eat, and while abstract, this is nonetheless a form of adulation. And whom could I be talking about, but celebrities? They're perfect, or at least perfect for the role: Oh so beautiful, oh so dramatic, and oh so unreachably far away. They are our modern day deities whom we read stories about and gossip about. We even treat them as if they were familiar friends. We casually drop their names, never acknowledging that these are people we do not know now, nor will we ever know them, and maybe that's their allure. The vast majority of us will never know these far off beautiful people whom we revere so much.

Doesn't that sound familiar to something or someone else? I can understand the comfort of it all. They are imperfect just like us, but oh how they radiate all the things so many of us covet in life: wealth, fame and unparalleled beauty. Yet, still they are human, they are flawed, and that is what makes them so easy to love. Yet this is a love that gives no understanding, and is never returned. It is an admiration that will never fulfill. It can only empty, leaving us wanting for more. I guess when it comes to the questions we cannot help but ask, I'd just rather look for answers than unrequited substitutions. I hope that you keep looking too, disappointment be damned.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

VOTING SHOULD MATTER

In response to Sanam Hakim's editorial, "I vote for No One," I would say that whether one writes in "No One" or votes for a third party, they are merely taking the vote and throwing it in the trash. As the late Joseph Stalin once said, "the people who cast the votes don't decide an election, the people who count the votes do."

On Nov. 2 we might as well stay home (voting is a security risk) and let the Electoral College decide which one of two old men win, regardless of the "popular" vote. The young aren't apathetic because they dislike democracy, the young are apathetic because they want democracy!

People think, "why should I bother when, like last time, the guy with the most votes lost?"

What is the point of taking place in a process which I have seemingly little impact on and in the end does the outcome matter?

I am personally going to vote for Kerry on Nov. 2, but I know it will only bring about superficial changes. It is up to our generation to create a true democratic process where our votes really are counted and do matter. No one will do it for us. We have to do for ourselves. We are the people! This is our nation and maybe we ought to take it back. Unless the sytem begins to change, apathy will continue to plague all potential voters. It is up to us. John Kerry and George Bush won't do it for us.

I leave the question up to you. How do we take back democracy? I don't have all the answers either.

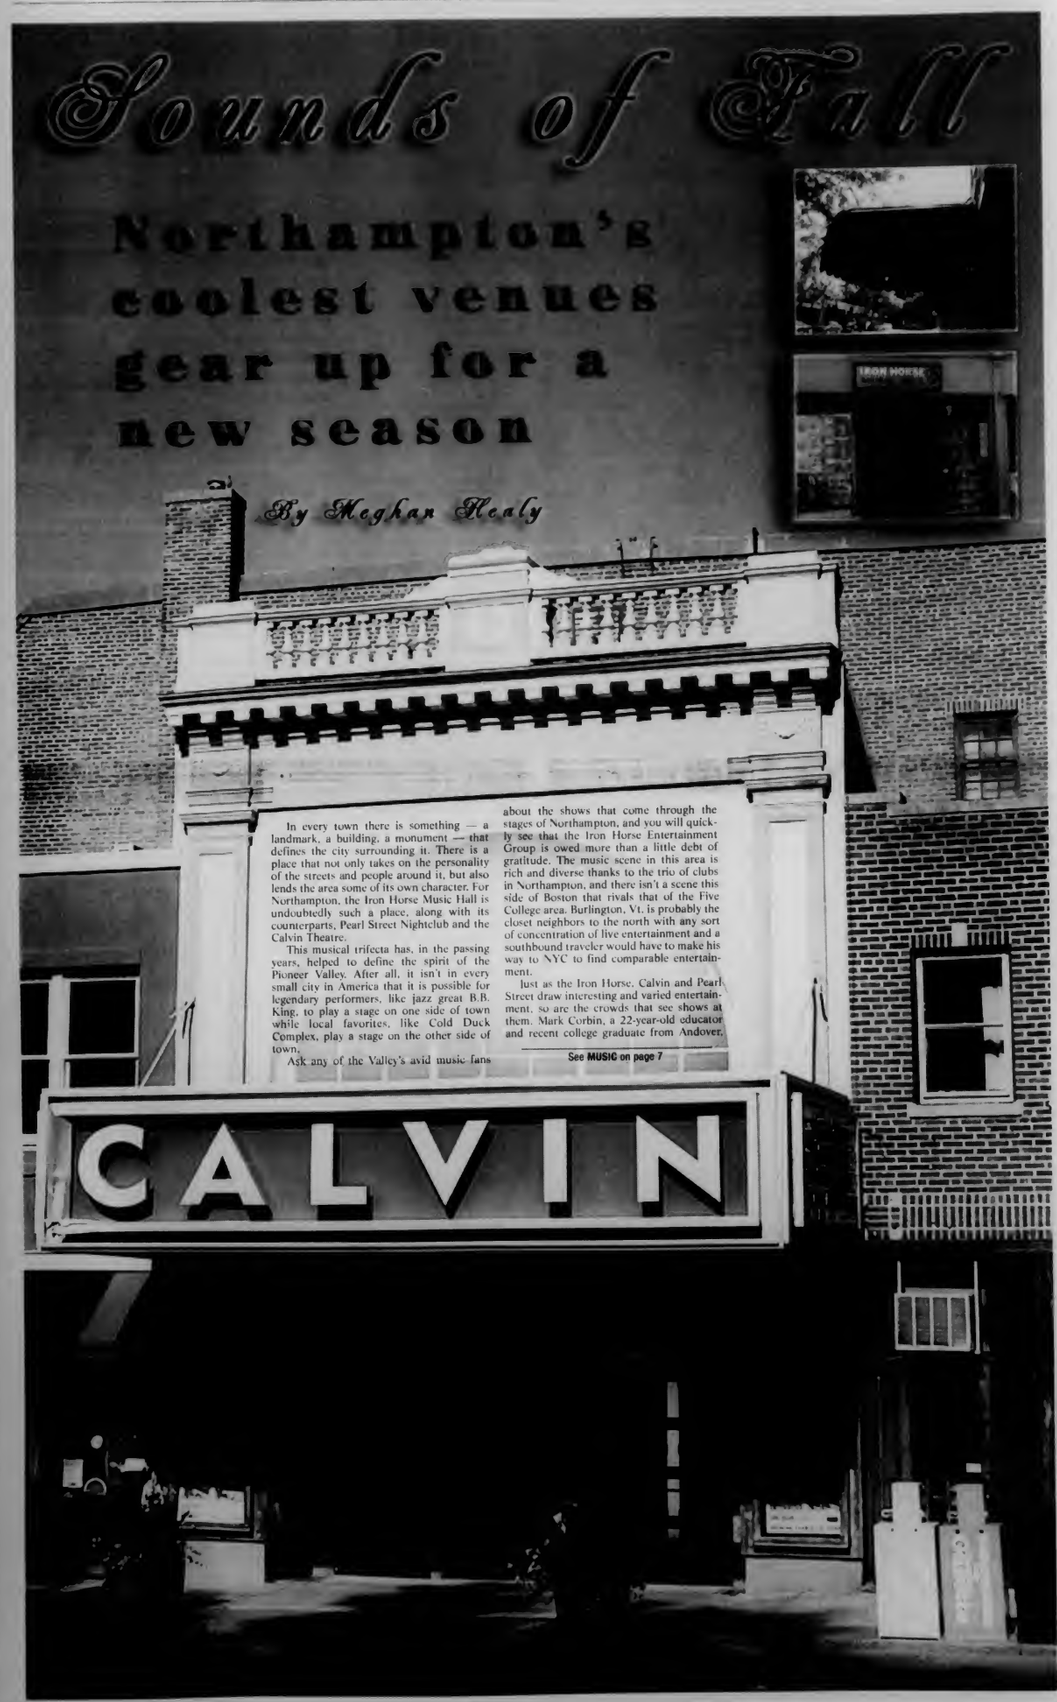
VOTING COULD MEAN LIFE OR DEATH

This presidential election will be critical for college students. In fact, its outcome could well mean the difference between life and death for many of you. Allow a gray-haired veteran of the '60s' anti-war movement to explain why.

I'm assuming you've heard of the US invasion and occupation of Iraq. The US has had 100,000 troops there for 18 months. Things are getting worse, not better. The strength of the Iraqi insurgency has been steadily growing and is now estimated at 20,000 fighters.

Here's the problem. To quell the insurgency, many more American troops will have to be sent to Iraq, but we have no more troops to send. We have already called up all of the available reservists and part-time National Guard members and we still need more, about 300,000 more. Who do you think will be sent to Iraq to fight? Please look in the mirror. You are in the crosshairs of a target.

There is only one way for the US government to come up with that many additional troops: reinstatement of a compulsory draft of 18-26 year-old men and women to serve in the armed forces. President Bush has already brought up the possibility of reinstating the draft. His advisors are interested in invading Iran as well. Republicans presently control both houses of Congress.



As I mentioned above, the outcome of this election could well mean life or death for many 18-26 year-olds. Do you want to die for Halliburton? If not, the time to start yelling is now.

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

In every town there is something — a landmark, a building, a monument — that defines the city surrounding it. There is a place that not only takes on the personality of the streets and people around it, but also lends the area some of its own character. For Northampton, the Iron Horse Music Hall is undoubtedly such a place, along with its counterparts, Pearl Street Nightclub and the Calvin Theatre.

This musical trifecta has, in the passing years, helped to define the spirit of the Pioneer Valley. After all, it isn't in every small city in America that it is possible for legendary performers, like jazz great B.B. King, to play a stage on one side of town while local favorites, like Cold Duck Complex, play a stage on the other side of town.

Ask any of the Valley's avid music fans about the shows that come through the stages of Northampton, and you will quickly see that the Iron Horse Entertainment Group is owed more than a little debt of gratitude. The music scene in this area is rich and diverse thanks to the trio of clubs in Northampton, and there isn't a scene this side of Boston that rivals that of the Five College area. Burlington, Vt. is probably the closet neighbors to the north with any sort of concentration of live entertainment and a southbound traveler would have to make his way to NYC to find comparable entertainment.

Just as the Iron Horse, Calvin and Pearl Street draw interesting and varied entertainment, so are the crowds that see shows at them. Mark Corbin, a 22-year-old educator and recent college graduate from Andover, Vt. recently traveled to Northampton to see folk singer Dar Williams perform at the Calvin Theatre. "I know I could have seen her closer to home, but I am glad I came here," Corbin said. "It's a great place to see a show." The character of the Northampton streetscape coupled with the elegant and welcoming atmosphere of the Calvin itself made the journey worth it for Corbin.

Iron Horse, Pearl Street and Calvin look to big fall season

The audience of any given show is pretty much guaranteed to be composed of not only Northampton locals and fans on a musical expedition, but also, many times in large numbers, University of Massachusetts students.

"I think it's cool, the whole variety they have there," said Elisha Trundle, a senior Communications major at UMass. Trundle, a Resident Assistant in Patterson Hall, transferred to UMass from the University of California at Santa Cruz in the spring of 2003. The scene in Northampton is a welcomed change for Trundle.

"The location makes it easy to go to shows," she said. "[In Santa Cruz] there were musical venues but we definitely had to go much further to see big acts."

Trundle certainly won't have to travel far to see some big acts this semester. The bills at Pearl Street, Calvin and Iron Horse are packed with a slew of both high profile and high talent acts, with more being added everyday. Among the performers scheduled to appear at the Iron Horse are musical masters Charlie Hunter Trio (Oct. 1) and indie favorites The Butchies (Oct. 29). According to iheg.com, "Hunter is the world's only simultaneous jazz guitarist/bassist, an eight-string feat that makes him unique."

UMass grad and Iron Horse favorite Stephen Kellogg will also appear there on Oct. 22. Folk artists Jay Unger and Molly Mason, who recent won acclaim for their scores in PBS's "The Civil War," will appear this weekend.

Pearl Street will welcome Sublime tribute band Badfish(Oct. 1), The Slip (Oct. 30) and The Wailers (Nov. 6) among others this fall. Medeski, Martin and Wood, a trio of arguably the best guitarists of our time will play the venue on Dec. 3 and groups like the Von Bondies (Sept. 30), Zox (Oct 8.) and Antibalas Afrobeat Orchestra (Nov. 5) will round out the line up.

The Calvin will host probably the most well known of the acts presented by IHEG. Grateful Dead alum Bob Weir (Oct. 14) will share the stage with the likes of acoustic rocker Howie Day (Oct. 17), piano great George Winston (Oct. 19), Kevin Bacon and his brother Michael (Nov. 18) and the Vienna Boys Choir wrapping up the season on Dec. 4.

For a full schedule off all the venues check out IHEG's website www.iheg.com.

Looking for an Opportunity to Make a Difference?

CIA's Directorate of Intelligence will be interviewing candidates for Analyst Positions.

Representatives from CIA's analytical arm, the Directorate of Intelligence, will be interviewing for analyst positions in Boston during the week of November 15th. Analysts work on the forefront of protecting national security, quickly assessing how rapidly changing international developments will impact US interests at home and abroad. They use information from classified and unclassified sources from around the world to develop and provide the reliable intelligence that is essential for US policymakers to make informed decisions. The DI is hiring for the following positions:

- Analytic Methodologist
- Collection Analyst
- Counterintelligence Threat Analyst
- Counterterrorism Analyst
- Economic, Political, Leadership and Military Analysts
- Science, Technology and Weapons Analyst
- Medical Analyst
- Psychological/Psychiatric Analyst
- Crime and Counternarcotics Analyst

Candidates must have at least a bachelor's degree with a minimum GPA of 3.0. Language skills, previous foreign area residence or travel, and relevant work experience are pluses. Candidates must successfully complete a medical examination, polygraph interview, and an extensive background investigation. All positions require US citizenship and relocation to the Washington, DC area.

The CIA is America's premier intelligence agency, and we are committed to building and maintaining a work force as diverse as the nation we serve.

For additional information, and to apply online, please visit www.cia.gov. Successful applicants who have submitted their resume by October 15th will be contacted to attend an information session and arrange a local area interview.

An equal opportunity employer and a drug-free work force.

Old 97's bring a little bit of country to NoHo

By Spencer Ziegler
Collegian Correspondent

In the front row of the Pearl Street ballroom on Tuesday night stood a teenager with a four-inch Mohawk swaying to the music alongside an old man with cowboy boots, leather pants and a ten gallon hat. This intriguing mixture of styles is what made the Old 97's concert a success.

The Old 97's appealed to both the cowboy and the rocker in everyone, with an eclectic set featuring songs from various albums and styles. The band captured everyone's attention by starting out with the up-tempo "Won't Be Home," off their most recent record "Drag it Up." They followed it up with some ballads ("Four-eyed Girl," which is off of lead singer Rhett Miller's solo album "The Instigator"), some country ("Mama Tried") and even a Kinks cover ("She's Got Everything") which the band recently recorded back in their home state of Texas. The band left the concert hall on as high of a note as they entered on by ending with the fan favorite "Time Bomb."

COURTESY KOLUMBUSNOW.COM

Alt-country band Old 97's brought their unique sound to the Pearl Street ballroom yesterday. The band proved their talents to a diverse crowd.

Not only did the band switch up the style and selection of songs, but also the singers. Bass guitarist Murry Hammond stepped up to the mic to sing a number of songs, most of which were selections off of earlier albums. On top of that, lead guitarist Philip Peeples surprised the audience for the first time this tour by taking over the singing duties for "Drag It Up's" "Coahuila."

Perhaps the real treat in hearing the Old 97's lies in the groups clever lyrics. Rhett Miller gave the audience plenty of nuggets of witty wisdom on Tuesday night with such lines as "I went through the motions with her, with her on top and me on liquor" from the song "Barrier Reef" and "You can go ahead and get married and this'll be our secret thing. I won't tell a soul except for the people in the nightclub where I sing" in the tune "Designs on You."

The band was on top of their game musically. The Old 97's played intensely, as shown by a number of broken guitar strings. Rhett Miller's singing was impressive as usual. He has an incredible vocal and emotional range to his voice. Yet, as the show went on it became clear that his voice was not where his real talent lies. Miller spoke of his real forte when he told the mostly college-aged crowd "I never went to college, but I think I'm getting my bachelor's degree tonight in shaking my ass."

And shake it he did.

He shook his tushy in any given song more often than Beyonce could ever dream of. The fact that he resembled Warren Sapp much more so than Beyonce was no deterrent for the singer. The rump-shaking was contagious and by the end of the night he had the whole crowd shaking it to the music with him. The cowboy, the mohawked kid and, yes, even this rhythmically-challenged Collegian reporter.

Opening act Chuck Prophet started the night out on the right foot along with his five-piece band. The band played a fast paced 30-minute set with a style that sounded like a bluesy mix of Dire Straits, Tom Petty and Cracker. The highlight of the performance was the moderate radio hit "Summertime Love" off of Prophet's 2002 album "No Other Love."

Eve gets her taste of Italy on a date with a made man

Original Sin

Eve

I was once told about a sacred ritual solely practiced by single women in their late 40s. I decided it was time to incorporate the tradition in my early 20s. It has been said to work, and I needed a quick fix.

It's a wish list. It maybe is more like a "make your perfect man" list, which a woman constructs on a blank sheet of paper. It can be long, short, descriptive or bland. Once this masterpiece of an unreasonably perfect man is created through words, the woman must burn it. The wish is then sent to a semi-perfect man through the smoky air, and soon enough, he will find you. What is the harm in that?

I was warned by many to be as detailed as I could. To write what I didn't want in the perfect man as well. But of course, I was too eager to listen. I spent one full day writing this list. Eight and a half pages later, I was ready. Upon burning the list, I suddenly realized how silly this seemed. How have I succumbed to this?

Later that night I headed out to one of my favorite nightspots. Before I had a chance to order, someone grabbed my hand and twirled me around. "Wanna dance?" he asked. I was startled for a minute by his aggressiveness.

"Who does that?" I thought. He was quite good-looking, slightly older than me, respectful, a good dresser and a very good dancer. These are five qualities on my list. "Sure," I say. We danced, and as we danced he told me about himself.

"I am Italian. I have six older sisters. I love expensive cars. I am in school at BU. I love animals. And I think you are beautiful." Six more attributes that I was looking for. A worldly man with intelligence and a heart. I couldn't believe my luck.

At the end of the night I gave him my number. He called me the next day. This is the first must on my list. I agreed to meet him for dinner that evening. As we sat comfortably together at the table, I noticed he was missing a tooth. Whoops, forgot to write down that little detail, but it didn't bother me. I actually thought it was funny.

He mentioned he has to fly to Italy later in the week to "take care of some business." I looked at him skeptically, but said nothing. His phone then rang and he answered, "You have two days. I want to see that money now!" He then slammed his phone shut. I suddenly had a sickening feeling in my stomach. He was Mafia. I forgot to write that down on the unwanted character traits.

I excused myself from the table and rushed to the bathroom. I called my closest-to-the-mafia friend and told him the name of the guy waiting for me just a few tables away.

"Get out of there, now," he said sternly. I felt like I was in a poorly remixed version of the Sopranos.

I crept back to the table and he smiled. "What took you so long? If we are going to see each other, you can't go around leaving me waiting, Eve, once you are in, you are in." He winked playfully and I lost my appetite. I forgot to add that I dislike angry men with murderous capabilities. I knew I had to go home and rewrite the list before anyone, such as myself, gets hurt.

I asked him politely if we could leave. I told him that I wasn't feeling well and it worked. As he walked me to my car, I remembered a simple rule in Mafia culture: once you're out, you're done. But, if you're never in, you're safe.

This was my chance. "You know, I don't think this will ever work. You are not the type of guy I'm looking for at the moment, but it was really great to have met you." I cringed to see his reaction. He stared at me blankly and leaned against my car.

"Why? Do you think I'm ugly?" I stared back in disbelief, "No! You look great. It's just that... I'm Jewish." That's all I had to say. He shook his head as if he was sorry, and gave me a long heartfelt hug.

"That's okay. I understand." He walked away. I guess I was never in. That was the first sentence I wrote down the second I got home.

Olympic champion Hamilton tests positive for blood doping

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Another sweet sports story turned sour with the news that Olympic cycling champion Tyler Hamilton tested positive for blood doping.

Because it almost doesn't matter what happens from here on out.

Cycling insiders will tell you the 33-year-old American was the nicest guy in racing, one of the most deserving, and the last one they thought would get busted. Cynics, meanwhile, simply wink at the notion that anybody that good in such a dirty racket could be clean.

In the past, Hamilton stood up for the rest of his sport. Those words used to carry a lot of weight. This time he was speaking for himself. The sad part is that nobody gets the benefit of the doubt anymore.

"I am 100 percent innocent," he said Tuesday while awaiting the results of backup tests. "I worked hard for that gold medal, and it isn't going anywhere."

Both the results of the new and improved doping tests in the Athens Olympic Games last month and at the Spanish Vuelta, less than two weeks ago, say something else. Both found evidence of blood from another person, a signal that Hamilton received a transfusion, an old-school cycling ruse to boost performance by increasing the amount of oxygen-transporting red blood cells in his system.

Hamilton called that "completely impossible." "No. 1, that's risking my life," he said, citing the fear of contracting AIDS. "No. 2, that's risking my wife's life. And for someone to accuse me of doing that ... I'm very angry about that."

And he's not the only one.

Summing up the mood in the riding community in the States, editor Steve Madden of Bicycling magazine said, "It's a bad day for American cycling if it's true. It's a bad day, in fact, even if it isn't true."

The reason is that stories abound about Hamilton's courage, his long-suffering display of loyalty and his sense of fairness as a competitor. The thinking goes that if guys like Hamilton are dirty, then maybe the cynics have it right; maybe everybody else is, too.

In the 2003 Tour de France, just two years after giving up his job as Lance Armstrong's chief lieutenant on the U.S. Postal squad to lead his own team, Hamilton broke his collarbone in the first stage and rode through the pain to a fourth-place finish.

In stage 15, after Armstrong bumped a spectator's bag early in the climb and crashed.

Hamilton raced to the front of the pack, waving his arms and yelling, forcing the other riders to slow and observe the code of honor that says nobody takes advantage of a fallen leader.

Armstrong caught up to the main pack, and then raced away with breathtaking swiftness, winning that day's race and setting the stage for the fifth of his six straight Tour titles. When Hamilton won the next day's race with a show of grit that defied everyone's expectations, Armstrong called it "the biggest day of the Tour."

Now those heroics, as well as the Olympic win that Hamilton called the "the highlight of my career, by far," are tainted. Where once we marveled at human achievement, we now immediately suspect better living through chemistry.

So it should come as no surprise that rumors about Hamilton were already making the rounds. According to one, an analysis of his time-trial win in Athens revealed Hamilton's "wattage" numbers – basically, a measurement of how much energy a rider produces and translates to the pedals – were significantly higher than normal.

His sponsor, a Swiss company named Phonak, said Tuesday it was standing behind Hamilton, but qualified that support a day later. Phonak chairman Andy Rihs had said that even another round of positives in Hamilton's backup tests would not necessarily convince him the rider was guilty of doping.

"I don't fire innocent people," Rihs said Tuesday. "For me, Tyler is innocent as long as no one proves the contrary."

But on Wednesday, the team released a statement under the heading "We believe Tyler," in which it said, "We have to concentrate on the facts. These seem to speak against Tyler. But so long as we're not 100 percent certain that he's guilty of manipulation," Rihs continued, "we will believe him."

Immediately below the statement, however, Phonak said Hamilton's suspension would hold "pending further notice" until tests and proceedings are completed.

"If Hamilton is not able to prove his innocence, then the contract will be canceled effective immediately," the statement said.

A few others will withhold judgment, but not many. Three gold medalists in Athens have already been stripped, and Hamilton would become the first American caught by drug testers. The concept of innocent until proven guilty still holds sway in a court of law here, but not in the court of public opinion.

And no matter how this story ends, all the good work Hamilton has done there is about to be undone.

Pats' Graham is catching on

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO (AP) — Daniel Graham was just a college sophomore when Ben Coates was wrapping up his brilliant career at tight end for the New England Patriots.

Now, after two seasons marked by injuries and dropped passes, Graham is making catches at a rate that matches Coates' production and is emerging as a bruising blocker.

He's developed from a first-round pick out of Colorado in 2002 who had just 15 catches in an injury-plagued rookie season.

This season, he has nine receptions and leads the AFC with three touchdown catches in two games after scoring just five touchdowns and totaling 53 receptions in his first two years.

"He's so strong," quarterback Tom Brady said. "He catches everything you throw to him. [He's] tough, hard-nosed, smart, and he's a great player. We're lucky to have him."

The Patriots, who take a 2-0 record into their bye week, also have Christian Fauria and rookie first-rounder Benjamin Watson from Georgia at a position where they struggled once Coates left after a 32-catch season in 1999. The next two seasons, their top tight ends were Rod Rutledge, Jermaine Wiggins and Eric Bjornson. The following year, Fauria led the tight ends with only 27 catches.

"That should be a productive position, and it has been," coach Bill Belichick said. "All three players have shown that they can be productive in the running game and the passing game."

From 1993 through 1998, Coates averaged 71 catches. Graham is on a pace to grab 72. Last year he had 38 catches and Fauria added 28. Any thought that they might rotate regularly as the No. 1 tight end vanished when Graham had an outstanding offseason.

"There isn't any competition. He's the starter and I'm just trying to pick up as many plays as I can," said Fauria, who also went to Colorado.

"The first I heard of him is when my buddy called me and said, 'Hey, there's this tight end at Colorado,' and I was like, 'Oh, yeah, yeah, whatever.' So I watched him on TV. I was like 'This guy's a beast.' Ironic. As it was he ended up signing here. I was like, 'Oh, great.' "

There's no sign of tension between the two. Graham said Fauria has helped him progress. Fauria, a 10-year veteran, calls the 6-foot-3, 257-pound Graham "one of the best blockers I've ever seen (at tight end). At least, top three."

He's also held on to passes after dropping several good throws the previous two seasons.

In the 27-24 season-opening win over Indianapolis, Graham had seven catches for 57 yards and an 8-yard reception that gave the Patriots a 27-17 lead late in the third quarter. Then he had just two catches, but they were for New England's only touchdowns, in a 23-12 win at Arizona.

"He really builds on the good plays and he's had so many good plays now it's hard to shake his confidence," Brady said.

Graham won the John Mackey Award as the top tight end in college football in 2001. Then he learned it wasn't as easy in the pros. Injuries limited him to 12 games as a rookie and he started only six.

"It wasn't frustrating for me," he said. "It was a learning experience that I went through and it's something a lot of rookies go through."

But he improved last season then reported in excellent shape after an injury-free offseason in which he was able to work out regularly. He's also benefited from two seasons plus the off-season with Brady.

"It's helped me out a lot just to understand what Tom's looking for when I run my routes," Graham said.

He's done it so well that Brady is looking for him in the end zone two years after Fauria caught seven scoring passes, most from inside the 20-yard line.

"I'm not saying I'm taking over anybody's role," Graham said. "I'm just getting open in the end zone and running the plays called."

Ryder Cup loss leaves bad taste

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

Phil Mickelson has a green jacket in his closet to remind him this has been a great year.

It just might not seem that way right now.

In the ultimate case of "what have you done for me lately," Mickelson has gone from Masters champion to Ryder Cup renegade.

He certainly wasn't the goat at Oakland Hills; for once, that was a team effort. But most of the criticism probably will fall into his lap for a series of dubious decisions that were magnified by poor play.

First, he changed equipment companies a week before the Ryder Cup. Then he didn't play on the tournament course the final two days before the matches.

All that would have been overlooked except for his performance. Mickelson got benched Saturday morning. He lost his singles match with what NBC analyst Johnny Miller called a "nut shot." And his 1-3 mark at Oakland Hills was the first time in five Ryder Cups that Lefty had a losing record.

Asked to explain what went wrong for the Americans, one can only hope Mickelson wasn't serious when he said that playing in the Ryder Cup was a "career-defining moment for us."

If that's the case, Mickelson's defining moment would be that knockdown 9-iron he tried to bounce onto the 16th green along the water at Oakland Hills, not the 18-foot birdie putt on the final hole at Augusta National. He would be remembered as the guy who skipped two days of team practice, not the one who so brilliantly mapped out a strategy at the majors that he came within five shots of winning all four. The next thing Mickelson said Sunday night was more accurate.

"When we get here, we are under constant ridicule and scrutiny over our play, and not coming together as a team, and all of this stuff that we know to be false," he said.

Mickelson was begging for scrutiny. Given the events leading up to the Ryder Cup, it's a wonder he didn't replace the small American flag on the back of his team uniform with a bulls-eye.

He is not the first player to change equipment before the Ryder Cup. Tiger Woods caused a stir when he switched to Nike irons a week before the '02 Ryder Cup at The Belfry. But then he won the World Golf Championship that week in Ireland by not making a bogey until the 72nd hole.

Mickelson switched to the Callaway driver, fairway metals and golf ball at the Canadian Open and tied for 57th with his highest-score of the year (291) and fewest number of birdies (11).

Not surprisingly, Mickelson was pounded with questions about his new tools during the Ryder Cup. It was easy to blame his play on the equipment change, even though he was coming off back-to-back bad weeks on tour.

Minutemen sneak past UNH

With the win, UMass coach Sam Koch pulls within one victory of becoming a 150 game winner on the Massachusetts bench.

Ross Fishbain gave UNH the game's first lead with an acrobatic goal at 11:51. Matt Bow set up the play by driving a corner kick to the near post. UMass goalie Colin Burns charged out of the net to intercept the pass, but was beaten to the ball by Fishbain, who bicycle-kicked the ball into the goal.

Roughly 10 minutes later, Bullen received a touch-pass from Ralph Pace from 20 yards out. He fired a shot to the top left corner of the goal to pull Massachusetts even. The score stood at one goal apiece at the break.

Commencement of the second half signaled the beginning of 10 minutes of stagnant play as the teams battled for position at midfield. Play went back-and-forth without either team gaining a decisive advantage, until a series of quick Wildcat passes at centerfield caused confusion among the Minutemen ranks and set up a Bryan Stewart goal. The Massachusetts defense scrambled to get into position but a well-placed pass by Brian Levey found its way into the offensive zone. The ball was chased down by Stewart and shot into the net at 55:15, putting the Wildcats back on top, 2-1.

"Defense was an issue, again we let up some soft goals," Koch said. "We still need to tighten up on the ball. We're certainly getting there, but it's taking longer than we expected."

The UNH lead was short lived however, because Charest recorded his first goal at 70:15. A crossing pass from Matty LeMire to Tyler Pagano led to a Pagano outside shot, which was deflected into the net by Charest. Pagano booted his initial shot from 20-yards out and both he and LeMire were credited with assists.

The rest of regulation continued without incident, setting the stage for the golden goal. In extra time, the Maroon and White kept the ball in its offensive zone for almost the entire 10 minutes, out shooting the Wildcats 3-0 and defeating UNH to improve to 26-11-3 all-time against New Hampshire.

For a relatively high scoring game, neither goalie was forced to make many saves. Out of 10 New Hampshire shots, only four made it on net, two of which were successfully saved by Burns. Massachusetts shot the ball 18 times and Brian Levey recorded five saves.

"We definitely created chances, that's not our problem," Koch said. "We have plenty of offensive ability and are always a threat to score, but that's not what we're stressing. We need to find a way to combine our offensive strengths with a sound defense."

UNH faltered in the second half, something it had not done thus far. Before facing the Minutemen, New Hampshire had out-shot foes 47-36 and after half-time they had outscored opponents 4-1.

The largest concern for Massachusetts entering yesterday's game was filling the void left by junior defender Tim Kitchell, who was issued a red card in Sunday's 3-1 loss to Harvard, and consequently forced to sit out the following game. Massachusetts addressed this issue by attacking the ball at midfield and pressuring UNH on offense. This strategy was intended to take pressure off the UMass defense and put it on the Wildcats.

"You just have to try some different things and find out what works," Koch said. "This is a very young team but we have some time before [Boston University] to work out some of the kinks."

Massachusetts will travel to BU on Sept. 28, to kick off a road trip that will keep the Minutemen away from Rudd Field until Oct. 15.

approximately 40 players on their preliminary rosters. While the chaos of the last few weeks has made it difficult to track or predict where NHL players will end up playing while the labor strife continues, it's certainly possible that the minor leagues will see many big leaguers spending their impromptu vacations in AHL uniforms.

For Mauldin, it won't be much added pressure. The winger from Hollliston played six games for the Columbus Blue Jackets, who selected him with their 10th pick (199th) overall in the 2002 NHL Entry Draft. Mauldin averaged 8:47 of ice time, took four penalty minutes and six shots during his short stint. Despite coming off of a college season that saw him emerge as one of the top scorers in Hockey East, Mauldin has no illusions of grandeur for this year, and isn't worried about "losing" a spot on the roster.

"I never really thought I had a spot on the team, so I'm just going to take it day to day," he said. "Spots come and go so fast in the pros, you can be up one day and they'll send you right back down because someone comes back from a healthy scratch. The management's trying to develop the players and win."

Peck finds himself in a slightly different situation. The Austrian defenseman entered the NHL as a free agent with the benefit of a full four years of college experience and the dividends of that, as well as his numerous appearances with the Austrian National team — including in the 2002 Winter Olympics. He also had two goals, two assists, and an average of 18:37 of ice time in his six games with the New York Rangers. For Peck, though nothing was set in stone, the lockout ended any hopes — and there were plenty — of starting the 2004-05 season with the Blueshirts.

"The way I look at is that I would have had a shot at the big club," he said. "[The lockout] makes a huge difference, because now there are 15 defensemen coming to Hartford instead of seven or eight. There would have been a few of us that would have made it. So now it's definitely going to be hard. It's going to be a battle, but it is wherever you go in the pros. It's never easy."

Kuiper, who couldn't be reached for this story, will head to the Norfolk Admirals camp on Sept. 30. Kuiper signed with the Chicago Blackhawks on March 30, but did not end up playing a shift for the team. He was officially assigned to Norfolk on Sept. 16, where he'll join nine other defensemen on the 33-man preseason roster.

Training camp will be Mauldin's first chance to get back to competitive hockey since the end of the 2003-04 season, but he said he's spent his summer preparing for his first full year as a pro.

"I think I'm doing just fine, it's just the little things, the thinking part of the game is a little bit faster," he said. "Players are bigger and stronger, and I think I got better with that. I'm up to 200 lbs., and at the beginning of the year I was around 190. I spent the whole summer out [in Ohio] working hard to train."

pick, and a personal foul was called on UMass.

The offense had to begin the ensuing drive on its own 10-yard-line. On the very next play, a 16-yard completion to Dominique Stewart, the Minutemen were flagged for another illegal receiver downfield, bringing the drive back to the five-yard-line.

After UMass was unable to convert a first down, C.J. Koegel was forced to punt from the back of his own end zone.

The penalties in this series of plays didn't end there as Brandon Freeman was called for kick catching interference, a questionable ruling since Harry Wilson was able to field the punt cleanly. Richmond began its drive on the Massachusetts 23-yard-line and was able to kick a field goal after only moving the ball four yards that drive.

UMass was trailing by 10 midway through the fourth quarter when Day threw a 10-yard touchdown pass to Stewart that was called back for offensive holding. The Minutemen weren't able to gain any more yards on the drive, and Michael Torres missed a field goal wide to the right.

Brown obviously didn't agree with the difference in penalty calls, and he sent a tape to the Atlantic 10 this week for them to check out.

He noted at the UMass Athletic Association Sports Luncheon yesterday that he thought Richmond center John Gronin could have been called for holding on every play. None of the Spiders' six penalties were holding calls.

"I think it's been so lopsided. I'm looking at the tape on Sundays, and I just want to make sure they're calling it both ways," Brown said.

"There are some things that upset me. Obviously, that's why I sent the tape in," Brown said. "The reality is that we're 2-1, and that's not going to change that.

You just want to make sure that you're pointing things out. There are two teams out there, and I think the lopsided piece is a little bit frightening.

MATTHEW REED/COLLEGIAN

Senior wide receiver Dominique Stewart and the Minutemen were flagged for 15 of the 21 penalties called during a loss to Richmond.

and scoring a touchdown, while Starks has chipped in with 171 yards on 31 carries.

"Bleiler is a big and powerful kid who's a banger, while [Starks] is a different cat, a little bit more shifty and shaky," Brown said. "Obviously Riccio is no slouch either carrying the ball, and when you put that together with four good wideouts, you've got your hands full."

One star that has returned for UD is first team All-A-10 cornerback Sidney Haugabrook, who earned his reputation as a pure playmaker from his elite skills as a kick returner but has also developed into one of the premier cornerbacks in the A-10.

He already has an interception to his credit and ranks third on the team in solo tackles with 14. He will likely be a big part of Delaware's attempt to shut down UMass star Jason Peebler. He is also expected to play a large role on special teams.

"[Outside of UMass] I think [Haugabrook] is the most productive corner in the conference," Brown said. "When you factor in the punt returns, he strikes feat in your heart."

"Just look at his numbers and make no mistake, he put them back in the game at Towson with an 80-yard punt return, and that's not the first time he's done that."

Peebler, meanwhile, practiced wearing a yellow "no-contact" jersey on Tuesday, but Brown expects him to return to regular workouts and be ready for Saturday.

The news is not as promising for defensive lineman Keron Williams, however. The junior continues to nurse an undisclosed injury sustained in the Colgate game, and Brown said his return would likely come a week from Saturday, when UMass travels to face Boston College.

A long-awaited rematch

UMass to host Delaware in latest battle of A-10's elite

BY MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Adversity introduces a man to himself."

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown was justifiably unhappy when he spoke those words on Wednesday afternoon. For the initial three games of the 2004 season, Brown has been relegated to watching his new team from the press box as part of a settlement with his former employer, Northeastern University. It was a difficult experience, one that Brown said "[may not] ever really leave me," and for those three games, the adversity was clearly on his shoulders.

Meanwhile, after winning the first two games in impressive fashion, the Massachusetts football team laid an egg Saturday. Opening their Atlantic 10 slate on a sloppy, rain-soaked field, the Maroon and White lost to Stacey Tutt and Richmond — a loss that was the team's first in Amherst since the end of the 2002 season.

The adversity had shifted, and now each of the Minutemen share part of the burden — the need to discover their identity as a team had clearly arrived, just a week before one of the biggest games of the season.

Last November, before a frenzied, sellout crowd of 21,804 at Delaware Stadium, the University of Delaware combined with the Minutemen for 182 offensive plays, 950 net yards, 50 first downs, four ties, and four lead changes before eventually outlasting Mark Whipple's squad 51-45 in triple overtime.

Now, the No. 4 Fightin' Blue Hens (2-1 1-0 A-10) and their legion of fans will arrive at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday for a 1 p.m. kickoff as the defending Division I-AA National Champions will face a No. 16 Massachusetts team (2-1 0-1 A-10) led by Brown for the first time in the most crucial of early season games.

For the Minutemen, a win would go a long way in helping Brown's first UMass team realize its true colors, while a loss would be devastating for either squad's playoff hopes at this early juncture of the I-AA season.

The rematch is certainly on.

"This is a big game for both teams, no question about it," Brown said. "We certainly have a challenge ahead of us. They're the No. 4 team in America and obviously our guys are excited to play this game."

"It means a lot to some of our core guys who were on the team last year and were a part of such a tough loss, to come back and have another crack at Delaware."

Despite winning the schools first championship at the I-AA level last year, all is not well in Newark for K.C. Keeler's group. The Hens dropped their season opener to New Hampshire in shocking fashion, and followed that up with unimpressive performances in wins over A-10 newcomer Towson and Division II West Chester.

Gone from Delaware's ranks are the reigning A-10 Offensive and Defensive Players of the Year in quarterback Andy Hall and defensive end Shawn Johnson, but Brown knows that Keeler has plenty to work with, including Missouri-transfer Sonny Riccio under center.

"They're pretty good," Brown said. "Riccio seems like he's getting better with each game. All the receivers are back and they look like pretty much the same group on offense.

"On defense they have a lot of guys back. It's going to be the same strong Delaware defense; some pressure, some base and very aggressive in nature."

One major difference for the Hens is at the running back position, where power back Sean Bleiler and speedster Tonnie Starks gives Keeler a good chance of pace in replacing the departed duo of Germaine Bennett and Antwan Jenkins.

The 220-pound Bleiler has emerged as the feature back after gaining 223 yards and 42 carries

UM alums ready for AHL camp

BY ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Finally admitting one of the worst-kept secrets in pro sports over the last six months, the National Hockey League put an end to any hopes of its 2004-05 season starting on time, when the NHL owners opted to lock out the players until a new labor agreement is signed. The main reason for the conflict, whether it'll be called a salary cap or "cost certainty," has divided the players and owners more sharply than the 2004 presidential election has the electorate. Though few related to the negotiations have come out and said it, there isn't much of an end in sight to the league's second lockout in the last ten years.

While many of the NHL's finest have agreed to play in temporary situations in Europe and North America, many young prospects are getting ready to begin training camp for the American Hockey League. The lockout won't prevent former Massachusetts standouts Greg Mauldin, Thomas Pock, and Nick Kuiper, from continuing their fledgling pro careers, but it could certainly make securing a roster spot on their minor league teams a little more difficult.

Pock and Mauldin both said that Hartford Wolf Pack and Syracuse Crunch camps, respectively, will number

Excessive penalties have cost Minutemen in early going

BY JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Anyone following the Massachusetts football team this season can make a few broad comments. The defense has been spectacular, the offense has been efficient, but the penalty numbers have been absolutely staggering.

The No. 16 Minutemen have been penalized 46 times for 383 yards through only three games this year. Their opposition has only been flagged 20 times for 155 total yards, an eye-catching number if one notices that UMass has averaged 127.7 penalty yards each contest.

Massachusetts was penalized 20 times in its 51-0 victory at Delaware State in their season opener. The team was only penalized 11 times against Colgate in their home opener, but two touchdowns were called back on the Minutemen in their 30-20 victory over the Red Raiders.

And last week, in a game refereed by Darrell Davis, the same referee who called the Delaware State game, UMass was flagged 15 times against Richmond, who was only penalized six times all game. The Spiders capitalized on the lopsided penalty numbers with a 24-14 victory at McGuirk Stadium.

It was a matter that concerned UMass coach Don Brown so much that he brought an official into practice last Thursday to help the Minutemen out with their formation shifts and technical aspects of the game to reduce the amount of calls against his squad.

The problem clearly went unsolved, and Brown was forced to address the topic again in practice this week.

"(Tuesday) we were talking about it after practice. We were really clean, really sharp and made our shifts and movements (at practice)," Brown said. "Whenever you make a focus as a coach, usually players will follow that focus."

In the game against Richmond, however, it was the timing and the way that the penalties were called that hurt UMass the most.

Richmond had the ball on a third-and-six at the Massachusetts 40-yard-line. Quarterback Stacy Tutt got in trouble and threw a pass directly at his offensive lineman, a play that appeared to be intentional grounding. Instead, a 10-yard holding penalty was called against UMass, which gave the Spiders an automatic first down and allowed Tutt to lead his team down the field for a game-tying touchdown.

On a drive late in the first half, Minuteman quarterback Tim Day threw an incomplete pass to tight end Mike Douglas. Although it appeared that UR linebacker Lance Gray grabbed onto Douglas, nothing was called. When the Massachusetts bench began yelling in disbelief, a sideline warming was issued against the Minutemen.

On the final play of the first half, a play that was granted after an uncertain group of officials awarded Richmond a first down after a short conference sparked by Richmond coach Dave Clawson, Tutt completed a 40-yard touchdown pass to Harry Wilson. A sizeable portion of the Spiders celebrated in the end zone, but no unsportsmanlike conduct was called against Richmond.

This conflicted with a call made against the Minutemen after free safety Shannon James intercepted a pass in the same end zone in the third quarter to end a long Richmond drive. About five members of the defense celebrated after the

Costello may miss remainder of 2004

While speaking at the UMass Athletic Association's weekly sports luncheon yesterday, Massachusetts football coach Don Brown said that senior defensive back Steve Costello might sit out the remainder of the season as a medical red shirt, opening the door for him to make a healthy return in 2005.

One of three captain-elects for the 2004 Minutemen, Costello was injured towards the end of the 2003 regular season, but continued to play through what then coach Mark Whipple described as an abdominal strain. The injury required off-season surgery. Costello flew to Philadelphia to be operated on by a specialist, whose prognosis indicated that the Kingston, N.Y. native would be healthy in time for the start of the regular season.

After sitting out during UMass' 51-0 win over Delaware State, Costello returned to limited action against both Colgate and Richmond, seeing the field for what Brown described as "eight to 11 plays," but he is still bothered by the troublesome injury.

"He's playing through a lot of pain," Brown said. "We're just not sure if it's worth it to have him out there at less than full speed right now, where we could have him healthy and at full speed next year. That's where we're at. Obviously that's something we're evaluating at this point."

What do you do when you are in desperate need of an overtime goal? Why not pass to a guy who scored a sudden death winner the previous week?

That's what the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-1) did yesterday and it worked wonders.

Facing a golden-goal situation with two minutes remaining in overtime, tied 2-2 with New Hampshire (1-2-3), UMass captain Oral Buflen found Rob Charest, who came through for the Minutemen with his second goal of the game.

Buflen forced a Wildcat turnover at midfield and drove a breakaway pass towards the UNH net, where Charest chased it down and put it away at 98:02. The decisive goal was Charest's second of the year. His first came in the 20th minute of overtime against Hartford on Sept. 14.

"It's kind of hard to believe," Charest said. "Coach was actually going to take me out on the next whistle, but I managed to get in a good scoring chance and end the game before he could."

The 3-2 win wraps up a five-game home stand in which the Minutemen played to a 3-2 record and improved their ratio of goals scored at home compared to goals scored on the road, to 12:2.

Dukakis speaks of universal health care

BY JEREMY DIRAC
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Former Massachusetts governor and 1988 Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis spoke to a full crowd at the Bowker Auditorium yesterday in Stockbridge Hall on the issue of health care in America.

"We now have 45 million people in this country without a dime of health insurance, overwhelmingly working class people and members of working families. These folks aren't loafing around, they're working. Some of them have two or three jobs."

Dukakis said that universal health care has been an issue since Theodore Roosevelt's presidency, and that we've been seriously debating it since President Truman. Ideally, he said he would like to see the universal health care plan proposed by Truman come about, but would settle on any type of universal plan as soon as possible.

"When people talk to me these days about incremental approaches to achieving universal health care I kind of sign off, maybe it's my advancing age," said Dukakis. Every person in Massachusetts would currently have health care if the universal health care bill he signed in 1988 were implemented, said Dukakis.

"Unfortunately, I left the statehouse when we began implementing it ... but [former Governor William] Weld never got it, he did everything he could to screw it up, and I regret to say he was successful. So, today my friends, we have some 250,000 more uninsured people in Massachusetts than we did when I left office."

Dukakis said that per capita, the United States spends twice as much on health care as the other industrialized nations and claims this country still has inferior service.

One of the main problems with our health care system, he said, is that you have certain companies which do not provide their employees with health insurance, which means that the slack has to be taken up by those that do, and by the government.

"Public funds that can't go to this university and education generally, and for affordable housing, and other important needs are not being met because they're getting sucked up as the commonwealth tries to fill this gap, which we just can't do."

Dukakis said that the Bush campaign would soon be talking about 'consumer driven health care.' The Bush campaign is opposed to a government-based system and favors improving the current plan.

Dukakis called Bush's plan "screw the little guy" health care. He said, "It's certainly not going to make a significant dent in the 45 million without health insurance."

The market cannot work in the case of health care, according to Dukakis.

"It doesn't work in transportation, and as the people of California know, it probably doesn't work in the distribution and generation of electric energy. There are some things you gotta' regulate. Health care's one of 'em."

Dukakis favors the health care plan proposed by his former Lieutenant Governor, John Kerry, where people will be able to buy into a government system.

"His health care plan is a heck of a lot better than the Bush plan," said Dukakis.

In regards to the presidential election, Dukakis acknowledged that the remainder of the race will be tough for Senator Kerry. In a press conference prior to his talk, Dukakis took aim at the Bush administration.

"This is the worst administration I've ever lived under, and I've been on the planet for seventy years," he said.

He said that the negative ads against Kerry — as well as Senator John McCain in 2000 and Senator Max Cleland in 2002 — are similar to what he experienced when running for president in 1988 against George H.W. Bush, who accused him of having psychological problems.

"The first guy spent six years in a cage, the second guy came back from Vietnam missing two legs and an arm and now they're trying to do it to Kerry. I think it's despicable, particularly coming from the source. And the notion that the Bush campaign and Mr. Rove had nothing to do with this is preposterous," said Dukakis.

Admission to the non-partisan Center for Public Policy and Administration sponsored event was free and open to the public. Following remarks by Provost Seymour and Chancellor Lombardi, Dukakis accepted the CPPA's Public Service Award – a Josh Simpson Megaplanet.

"This recognizes your lifelong accomplishments as a leader in public affairs and your ongoing commitment to educating and inspiring ..." said Lombardi.

Dukakis first became Governor of Massachusetts in 1974. He was reelected in 1982 and 1986 – an unprecedented third term "by one of the largest margins in history," according to the CPPA bio. He lost to George H.W. Bush in the 1988 presidential race. Currently he teaches at Northeastern University and has no plans to return to public life.

"One of the reasons I teach today ... is because my mission in life is to encourage young people to pursue a life in public service ... in trying to make life better for ones fellow citizens, that's what it's all about," he said.

Former Massachusetts governor Michael Dukakis spoke with Chancellor John Lombardi during his speech yesterday in Bowker Auditorium.

SGA and GSS speak to faculty

BY DAN KOFFMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts SGA President Eduardo E. Bustamante and Graduate Student Senate President Uri Strauss distributed a letter concerning the proposed textbook rental system to faculty as they gathered to convene for the semester's first Faculty Senate meeting, held yesterday in Herter Hall. Faculty Senate proceedings also included two motions to address the SPIRE situation, and an informal administrative address from Chancellor John Lombardi concerning the University's budget.

The letter which Bustamante and Strauss presented asked for the Senate's help in passing the textbook rental proposal, which would relieve students of the growing financial burden each semester.

"In his ten-minute address, Bustamante related to the assembly how he had surveyed approximately 600 students in front of the Textbook Annex during the first days of the semester. The surveys detailed, according to Bustamante, that nursing students were paying upwards of $1000 this semester on textbooks, and that other students were paying sums close to that amount.

The letter also put into detail how the rental system would work.

"With this system, full-time students pay from $120 to $150 per semester to rent their textbooks. If they wish to purchase them at the end of the semester, they can; and they do so at a discounted rate."

Bustamante asked two things of faculty members at the meeting: "First, the faculty must use the rental system for every course where it is possible to do so. Second, the faculty must assign the same textbook for a minimum of two years, except in rare exceptions."

Follet, the company that is in control of operations at the Textbook Annex, has a contract with the University that expires in July 2005. Bustamante told the Faculty Senate that action must be taken as soon as possible.

"If we don't do it now, the next five years will have students paying a ridiculous amount of money for books," he said.

In addition to the discussion of textbook costs, Strauss brought up the issue of housing for graduate students. Graduate students, said Strauss, were "squeezed out of Crampton [Hall]" over the summer, leaving Prince Hall as the main abode for graduate students seeking on campus housing. He also said that new ventures to create housing on campus will prove to be too expensive for his fellow graduate students to utilize.

Upon the conclusion of Bustamante and Strauss' presentations, the Senate moved onto the motions of the day as well as other administrative announcements.

The proceedings opened with the approval of two movements involving SPIRE, the Web site that provides student access to the Student Information System and its Internet server Peoplesoft. The first movement dealt with establishing a more effective process through which faculty will be able to report problems and follow the progress of solving submitted problems regarding SPIRE or Peoplesoft. The second motion dealt with the Faculty Senate authorizing the Rules Committee to establish a committee to explore the success of alternatives to SPIRE at institutions similar in size to UMass Amherst, to give the University a "comparative basis" with which to judge SPIRE.

Giving his administrative update, Chancellor John V. Lombardi spoke about the student acceptance rate for this year, which is nearly identical to that of the previous year. He then announced that 70 new faculty members have been recently hired for this year or coming year, and 40 more will be recruited for hire within the next calendar year.

Lombardi relayed that the "operating budget of the University is basically flat," meaning the bottom line will be very similar in number to that of last year's budget. He reiterated that the budget plan that was put into place last year is still being used, and no unforeseen circumstances have caused the budget to be disrupted tremendously. "All in all," he stated, "we're pretty much on track."

Second Durfee benefit concert raises over $400

BY HANNA DRAKE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Sam Krentzman rocked out in an impromptu performance yesterday at the Second Annual Durfee Conservatory Benefit Concert. Krentzman, a junior Chinese language and literature major at the University of Massachusetts, and one of the coordinators of the event wasn't planning on performing, but one of the scheduled bands didn't show up.

The benefit concert, which was held at the conservatory's gardens from 5-8 p.m., featured jazz, funk, bluegrass, and rock music. Among the bands present were Rudy Brown, Northern Aggression, and The Chicken Stand Throw Down Band. Between sets, visitors won prizes such as a skin care kit and gift certificates to the Black Sheep and Amherst Books. Coordinators also sold drinks and a variety of homemade cookies baked by Sarah Rutherford, a senior English major involved in the concert's organization.

Aaron New, a UMass student, said "[The Benefit Concert is] pretty cool. I came here last year, and it seemed pretty successful, and it's nice because it's for charity." His friend Kathryn Devaney, a senior at UMass, agreed, "I came because I think Durfee is one of the most beautiful places on campus, so anything to benefit it is a great thing."

The concert also attracted people new to Durfee's splendors. "I live in Central, so I walk through [Durfee] a lot, but this is the first event I've been to," said Francis Wilkins, senior accounting major at UMass.

"It's a beautiful night, and the band we heard [Sam's band] was great. Durfee is really beautiful. I've never been in here before," said Carol Krentzman, mother of coordinator Sam Krentzman.

With two hours remaining, the proceeds of the benefit were estimated by Durfee's Interim Director Armand Prevost at $400. "I think the turnout has been very good, actually, almost equal and if not, better than last year," Prevost said, estimating that there were 200 people present. "We've got a great night, great groups here, and a lot of great people from campus," he added. Prevost wants people to know that Durfee is open to everyone: it's relaxing, healthy, and gorgeous in the wintertime. But, he added, it would be possible to just walk by. "Maybe [students] think they can't come in. People can go to school for four, five years here, never knowing that they can come. But that's what we're trying to do, let students know it's here for them," Prevost said. He also mentioned that there would be another benefit concert in the spring semester.

Prevost teaches the history of plant matter, propagates failing plants, and teaches work-study students how to work with plants. He's also running a bonsai workshop that will begin this Saturday morning. Prevost has "a lot of things" planned for the conservatory, including a medicinal and herb garden, which could benefit sports medicine. He's also "mending a broken bridge" by working with the Amherst Orchid Society. According to Prevost, after January of next year Durfee will begin to host four orchid shows a year, showcasing 400-700 kinds of orchids.

Krentzman thought the benefit concert was very successful. "People came out to have a good time and to enjoy the music and to support Durfee, and that was exactly what we wanted."

Chief Metawampe statue vandalized near Campus Center

BY ERIKA LOVLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Chief Metawampe statue was stolen from its stand near the Student Union around 5 a.m. on Sunday morning. The approximately 500-pound statue was pulled from its stand and then dragged into the roadway of North Pleasant Street. The University of Massachusetts police department is searching for suspects in the vandalism.

"The Chief is okay, but he's damaged," said Larry Snyder, associate director of buildings and grounds services at the Physical Plant.

The bronze-coated statue sustained notable damage, including a leather and rifle broken off. UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said he was unable to estimate the damage cost or when the statue will be repaired.

"It appears as if a vehicle was involved, but we're not totally sure if that is the case," he said.

"There's evidence of some type of vehicle," said Snyder. "Possibly, a car drove down the street [North Pleasant Street], up over the curb, backed up, Metawampe lawn and put him [Chief Metawampe] in the trunk."

Snyder said the statue itself stands 5-foot, 8-inches tall and was secured by four bolts on a granite pedestal that is approximately 3 feet tall. The statue normally stands overlooking the Campus pond behind the Student Union in a large patch of rhododendrons on Metawampe Lawn.

"It looks like they knocked him [The Chief] over, picked him up, put him in the back of a trunk and took off and dumped him in the middle of the street," said Snyder.

"There were thoughts it could be a fraternity prank," said Archbald. "We don't have any suspects."

Due to the statue's size, Snyder said it would have taken four strong people to lift the statue and put it into the trunk of a vehicle.

"The poor guy is in our [The Physical Plant's] storage facility until we can fix him," he said.

Snyder is currently collaborating with members of the Arts Department who have experience working with bronze, hoping to come up with damage estimates and a repair plan.

"Hopefully, we'll get an estimate on fixing, and fix him to be remounted," he said.

The Chief Metawampe statue was donated by the Class of 1930 and erected by the Class of 1936, according to Snyder.

According to UMass History Professor Alice Nash, Chief Metawampe symbolizes the University's relationship with the native peoples who once inhabited the area.

Police are investigating the vandalism of the Chief Metawampe statue, ripped off its stand Sunday morning.

Kerry: Bush heading toward the draft

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

KING OF PRUSSIA, Penn. (AP) — President Bush mocked John Kerry's fitness to be commander in chief Wednesday, saying the way to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq "is not to wilt or waver." Kerry suggested to a campaign crowd that Bush might bring back the military draft and said in an Associated Press interview that the president was "living in a make-believe world."

Answering a question about the possible revival of the draft at a forum with voters in West Palm Beach, Fla., Kerry said, "If George Bush were to be re-elected, given the way he has gone about this war and given his avoidance of responsibility in North Korea and Iran and other places, it is possible."

Bush, trying to show a leadership contrast with his Democratic opponent, said on a campaign trip to battleground Pennsylvania: "I'm driven by my desire to protect the American people. I'll be steadfast in my resolve to do everything I can to make you secure."

Less than six weeks before the election, Iraq's prominence as a campaign issue was increasing, thrust to center stage by spreading violence, kidnappings, beheadings and the deaths of more than 1,000 U.S. troops. With Americans divided about the war, Bush is trying to keep voters focused on what he says are Kerry's conflicting statements rather than the daily bombings and bloodshed.

President George W. Bush speaks at a Pennsylvania elementary school as part of a tour through the state. Bush and rival John Kerry have been debating the war in Iraq over the past few days.

CHARLES DHARAPAK/ASSOCIATED PRESS

"George Bush is trying to fight a phantom here because he won't tell the American people the truth, so he sets up something that's not a real issue and attacks it," Kerry said in the AP interview after his West Palm Beach event. He said Bush was "living in a make-believe world," unwilling to tell the truth or to understand the situation in Iraq.

"Even today, he blundered again saying there are only a handful of terrorists in Iraq," Kerry said. "George Bush retreated from Fallujah and other communities in Iraq which are now overrun with terrorists and threaten our troops."

Bush, in Pennsylvania, had said, "It's hard to help a country go from tyranny to elections to peace when there are a handful of people who are willing to kill in order to stop the process. And that's what you're seeing on the TV screens. You know, these people cannot beat us militarily."

Bush said the insurgents "use the only tool at their disposal, which is beheadings and death, to try to shake our will. They understand the nature of America. ... We weep when we think about the families affected by those who have been brutalized by these terrorists."

Back in Washington, Vice President Dick Cheney went before television cameras on Capitol Hill to say Kerry's statements on Iraq and the war on terror showed "someone who lacks the resolve, the determination and the conviction to prevail in this conflict."

In that same vein, the Bush campaign put out a new television advertisement ridiculing Kerry on Iraq and other issues. It shows Kerry windsurfing left and right and says his positions shift "whichever way the wind blows." The democrats struck back with their own ad that says: "In the face of the Iraq quagmire, George Bush's answer is to run a juvenile and tasteless attack ad."

Kerry accuses Bush of creating a major crisis in Iraq with no prospect of an end. A number of U.S. troops have had their assignments extended because of the war, but Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other Pentagon officials have said repeatedly that reviving the draft would be neither necessary nor desirable. The Bush campaign called Kerry's comment on the draft irresponsible.

Bush campaigned Wednesday in the suburbs of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. It was his 37th visit to Pennsylvania, his top target in the presidential sweepstakes with 21 of the 270 electoral votes needed to win. Four years ago Bush lost Pennsylvania to Democrat Al Gore but polls show the race this year is close.

In between speeches, Bush took an aerial tour of Allegheny County, where the remnants of Hurricane Ivan caused flooding that damaged or destroyed thousands of homes and businesses.

On Iraq, Bush will meet at the White House on Thursday with Ayad Allawi, the prime minister of Iraq's interim government who has said the terrorists are being defeated. Bush cited Allawi as a witness to the wisdom of U.S. policy.

"These are critical times and I'm glad the prime minister is here to reinforce the strategy we have in place," Bush said. He said more Iraqis have electricity now than under Saddam Hussein and that more children are going to school and getting immunizations.

Violence sweeps through Iraq

Shiite Muslim clerics still promise elections

By Denis D. Gray
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — U.S. warplanes blasted insurgent positions in Sadr City, and American ground troops pushed into the sprawling Baghdad slum Thursday in a new operation aimed at disarming the militia of a renegade anti-U.S. Shiite cleric.

Despite violence sweeping the country, Iraq's top Shiite Muslim cleric Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani is insisting elections promised for January must be held on time, an aide said.

With car bombs, shootings and kidnappings escalating and several cities effectively under insurgent control, there are concerns that Iraq will not be ready to hold a vote by the Jan. 31 deadline. But Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of Iraq's 25 million people, are eager to hold elections since they expect to dominate whatever government emerges.

This image of Kenneth Bigley, a British hostage in Iraq was released Thursday. The hostage takers are threatening to murder him within 48 hrs.

Interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi, in a speech to a joint session of the U.S. Congress on Thursday, vowed not to let violence derail the election timetable. He said 14 or 15 of Iraq's 18 provinces "are completely safe."

However, at least six provinces — Baghdad, Anbar, Diyala, Salahuddin, Kirkuk and Nineveh — have been the scene of significant attacks on U.S. troops and Iraqi authorities in the past month. The only areas not plagued by bloodshed are the three northern provinces controlled by Kurds. The situation in many areas, however, is unknown since journalists' travel is restricted by security fears.

Allawi also condemned the beheading of two Americans, and relatives of a British hostage pleaded for his freedom. The appeal came after U.S. and Iraqi authorities refused militants' demands to release female Iraqi prisoners.

American warplanes and helicopters were again in action over Sadr City on Thursday, following a day of fierce clashes between U.S. troops and fighters loyal to rebel cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Iraqi doctors said one person was killed Thursday and 12 were wounded, many of them children.

Militia fighters returned fire with machine guns and an American Bradley fighting vehicle was hit by a rocket-propelled grenade and caught fire, according to a U.S. military report. It was not clear if there were casualties.

Duke professor reflects on Brown v. Board decision

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students, faculty and community members packed SOM's Flavin auditorium to hear the lecture, "The Whole United States is Southern! Brown v. Board and the Mystification of Race," given by Charles M. Payne, a Sally B. Robinson professor at Duke University.

"This is exactly what are hopes were for this commemoration. We gathered a lot of people into a room and asked controversial questions," said Carl H. Nightingale, UMass associate professor of history and program coordinator of events.

Payne touched upon many moments in the landmark Supreme Court case Brown vs. Board of Education, starting with explaining when he believed the use of the word segregation went into use in the south. He said it was used by southerners during the Civil War time period. Segregation was a word used by southerners who had some control over the southern economy. Confederate soldiers had always believed there was something problematic with blacks, explained Payne.

At points during his speech, Payne placed the audience in the shoes of African-Americans during these times of social anxiety.

"Think about being black and in high school and not being able to go eat in your cafeteria for four years just because you weren't the same color," described Payne. "There was great fear in black communities, they worried about what would happen if their children were put in with whites. What if the teachers their kids had lost their jobs because of the Brown v. Board of Education settlement, and they did."

Payne also added the fact that even though this court decision may have helped black students join with whites, but reactions were varied.

"The symbolism of this decision probably wasn't that meaningful to blacks who were poor. After all, it didn't help put any food on their plates," Payne explained. "Parents were often caught between making the decision of where their kids would go to school."

Faculty at the event, including UMass Chancellor John Lombardi, lauded Payne for coming to speak to the UMass Campus.

"When we come across a great scholar such as this, to be able to have him here is an honor," said Chancellor Lombardi.

The lecture program is being funded by 1967 UMass graduate Kenneth R. Feinberg and his family and friends. Other sponsors for the program include the UMass College of Humanities and Fine Arts, the Department of Afro-American studies, the Department of Women's Studies, the Department of Legal Studies, the Center for Public Policy and Administration, the Political Economy Research Institute and the Sports Management Department.

Feinberg was an assistant United States attorney in the Southern District of New York in the 1970s. He also served on Special Counsel, and the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary from 1975 to 1978. From 1977 to 1979, he served as an administrative aide to Sen. Edward Kennedy.

"The UMass History Department commends Feinberg," said Gerald W. McFarland, professor of history and director of undergraduate studies. "He's truly an amazing individual whose professionalism has repeatedly been recognized through appointments through major public service posts."

Feinberg-lecturer Charles Payne is the author of many works, including "Getting What We Ask For: The Ambiguity of Success and Failure in Urban Education" and "I've Got the Light of Freedom: The Organizing Tradition in the Mississippi Civil Rights Movement."

A different perspective from the outside world

Ben Duffy

Some conservatives just make conservatives look bad. Perhaps you know what I'm talking about — when a person of a similar political stripe as your own goes out and says stupid things that reflect poorly on your own politics. Suddenly, you find yourself on guard seemingly defending viewpoints that you may not even agree with yourself.

I've discovered a diseased thread in the conservative cloth. I don't like to admit it, because I call myself a conservative. It hit me in the face just the other day, when talking with a fellow conservative, that there are some people in my camp who believe that you can't truly love America until you hate every other nation on earth. Any type of curiosity about a foreign nation is to be shunned as un-American.

Such an attitude feeds the flame of liberalism. They already have the idea in their minds that they are the enlightened ones, in contrast with the insularism of the right. They seem to think that conservatives would all be cured of their affliction if they would just open their eyes to the great big world that exists outside of the United States. After all, they believe, conservatism is synonymous with narrow-minded Americanism.

As long as I can remember, I've never believed that true patriotism comes from contempt for the rest of the world. I've always had a taste for other languages and cultures, history and geography. I enjoy traveling and learning. I know several UMass students who are more traveled and are worldlier than I am, but they represent a small fraction of the student body. In my short time on this earth, I've been to 27 U.S. states, 14 countries and three continents. Every new trip I've embarked upon has been a priceless learning experience.

In order to be a lefty in good standing, you have to be cosmopolitan, and you can't be truly cosmopolitan until you believe that America is always wrong.

I've always loved history and geography. In middle school, I twice won the school geography bee, and once went to the state finals at Clark University. In high school, I took both French and Spanish, and managed to get A's in every class except French I, when a pulled a paltry B minus. When I graduated, I was given the award for excellence in French. These days, my passion is for German language and culture.

I never found any of this to be in conflict with my conservative values either. During the two wonderful years I spent in Germany, I was never overcome with the urge to hand over American national sovereignty to the United Nations, or to outlaw virtually all firearms.

Sadly, I've found that liberals have exactly the opposite attitude, and it's just as misguided. In order to be a lefty in good standing, you have to be cosmopolitan, and you can't be truly cosmopolitan until you believe that America is always wrong. A good liberal spends sleepless nights fretting over the popularity of our president among Europeans. A good liberal thinks that a foreign viewpoint always represents an enlightened philosophy, and a contrasting American idea is backwards by default. A good liberal believes that we should vote the way foreign nations want us to vote, so as not to seem too arrogant or unwilling to join the "world community."

Take, for example, the Clinton-Lewinsky scandal of 1998. At its height, I remember the Clinton-defending pundits on network news telling us that the French were laughing at us. All of those saucy Frenchmen across the pond thought that the whole saga was typically American — childish, puritanical, naive. Europeans, we were told, were not so easily scandalized, and they believed that private sex lives should remain private, even when they belonged to public figures. They seemed to think that we Americans were making a big deal out of nothing. After all, it was just sex!

There's just one problem — the French, in their infinite wisdom, were misinformed as to the issues at hand. Clinton was not in hot water because of a consensual affair. The charges against him included perjury, suborning perjury and obstruction of justice. The president was trying to cheat Paula Jones out of her fair day in court, plain and simple. We now know that Clinton was undeniably guilty of two of the three charges.

I've been to France twice since the whole Lewinsky debacle, and I haven't changed my mind. I still believe that perjury and obstruction of justice are serious crimes, no matter what the French say. If that makes me a rube, than so be it. Personally, I think that it just makes me a whole lot more informed as to what actually happened than the French are. I'm not going to change my opinion based solely on the fact that a foreign nation disapproves of my backwards-American idea that Clinton committed serious crimes that warranted his removal from office.

I read a Molly Ivins column concerning recent a trip she made to Canada. Her thesis was that President Bush is the laughing stock of Canada, and that Canadians were raising a unified eyebrow in dismay that we might actually elect the guy again. Well, good for the Canadians. It just so happens that Bush isn't seeking office in Canada, and so I'm not the least bit persuaded by their opinion. But for a liberal, these Canadian aspersions mean that we have to boot Bush out of office and mend fences with our neighbors to the North. I assume that Canada will consult us the next time Paul Martin, Canada's left-of-center prime minister, is up for reelection — fat chance of that happening.

Or perhaps it's the war in Iraq, homosexual marriage or capital punishment. Whatever the particular issue may be, it's important to form our opinions based on the facts, not on whether a viewpoint is popular in Canada, Sweden or any other country. I hate to disappoint Molly Ivins, but when I find myself in the election booth, I'm going to weigh the merits of the candidate, not his popularity in foreign lands. This is our country, not theirs. They're free to their opinions, just as I'm free to mine. The difference between my opinion and theirs is that I'm an American citizen and I can vote in American elections.

No more elected cowboys

Kate Baldacci

This is my tribute to the polarized electorate.

I hate to burst the proverbial bubble, but the United States is something of a joke in the international arena. Try blatantly showing your American pride when abroad and see if anyone takes you seriously.

A recent poll of 35 countries found that only one in five people want President Bush elected. Please, I beg of you, don't take the stance that "it doesn't matter." We are not an isolated country, on a planet all alone (although it is beginning to feel this way). America is nothing without its worldly context — existence necessitates a backdrop. Taking this into consideration is not only a good idea; it's a necessary part of being a citizen of the world.

Obviously this alone cannot constitute John Kerry's foreign policy plan; it's going to take more than Kerry simply stepping into the oval office and beginning his presidency in order for America to once again be respected in the world. But I don't think I'm far off base to presume that this simple symbolic action would be a huge leap in the right direction.

The fact of the matter is that following the events that took place on Sept. 11, America was united in our sorrow. We had the world's attention, the world's adoration and the world's sympathy. For a rare moment in history, we were truly united.

President Bush did his part to captivate us with his emotion-filled speeches following the event. Yet, I hold him that almost anyone could have handled the situation to the extent that Bush did. Admit it; Americans wanted someone to look up to, someone with misty tears in his eyes and strength in his step. What we got was Bush, but this is not to say that he was the best man for the job.

In the months that followed Sept. 11, he abused our unadulterated attention, our deference to the higher authority. He continued to elevate our already heightened levels of fear, keeping our attention in check with a glorified color wheel. Not that an informed populace is a bad thing, but this spectrum of shades had two effects on Americans: complete disregard, or complete fear – neither of which are productive emotions in the face of potential danger, both of which grant Bush more power to make decisions on behalf of society.

It makes me sick to envision Bush, standing before the United Nations and grinning broadly, touting the supposed success in Iraq like it was a science fair project; a mere experiment in the expanse of his power.

This event, this frightening day in American history, is the bedrock upon which Bush is running his campaign. Try telling me that the Republican Convention's proximity to Sept. 11 was merely due to scheduling conflicts. After all, what is there for him to run on? The things that immediately come to mind: economic shortfall, a record budget deficit, our environment, that is getting worse before stands are made to improve it, children who are being left behind. Sept. 11 is all that remains, the one thing we are almost all in agreement over. Bush is human, so naturally he is conjuring up images of fallen brothers, forcing us to somehow correlate the travesty with his authority to make outlandish decisions.

Everyone criticizes Kerry's stance on Iraq and the War on Terrorism (please note that I list them separately due to their lack of substantial connections). Some of this is founded. As a Presidential candidate, it is expected that you will be clear about your intentions (President Bush, are you writing this down?). When Kerry spoke recently at New York University he cleared up the confusion by laying down a decisive plan to ameliorate our current situation in Iraq.

To the Bush administration's reply of "we are already doing that," I reply, "Oh, you're already doing that?" Explain why are we breeding more terrorists? Why are we approaching this unilaterally? I'm not saying that we need Mr. Sensitivity in Iraq; Kerry is no pushover. But we need to realize that taking a cookie cutter approach to imposing a democracy puts us back in grade school. The situation necessitates a reassessment. It makes me sick to envision Bush, standing before the United Nations and grinning broadly, touting the supposed success in Iraq like it was a science fair project; a mere experiment in the expanse of his power. A test of how much he can get away with before the American public comes to its senses.

Obviously, one would not expect him to decry the scenario, it is after all, an election year. Bush reminds me of the guy that gets lost on a barren street and fails to ask for directions, only to find himself deeper into the woods. "It's alright; I've got this under control." Look over your shoulder, President Bush. Who is behind you now after public sentiment flip-flopped and support for the war is waning?

I had the privilege of attending the Democratic National Convention this summer in Boston. All week long, the mantra was "be positive." Kerry was clear that the Bush administration was not to be attacked. Do Americans value honorable behavior anymore? Decency? Courtesy? No, we want the cowboy. We want politics to look like it does on the big picture with mud slinging, good guys and bad guys abound. So I guess that's what we get. Now it's time for you to decide who ends up on top.

The future of instant messenger

Michelle Dozois

One afternoon this week, my friend "Sally" (not her real name) came into my room and asked me, "Can I read the away messages on your buddy list? I've already read all of the ones on mine." I said yes — only because I had some cleaning to do, and therefore wouldn't be able to do any right-clicking of my own for the next few minutes anyways.

Out of our group of friends, Sally and I are probably the people most preoccupied with AIM (or maybe we're just the most obvious about it). During a typical night out with Sally, she'll usually ask anyone with a nearby computer, "Can you check and see how long I've been idle? I love being idle!" During a typical night at our — I mean her — apartment, she'll often leave a room saying, "I have to go read away messages now."

I, on the other hand, try to be stealthier about my fascination with AIM, although the fact that my profile changes more often than my roommate showers (don't worry, she showers daily) is probably a tip-off of how much time I spend online.

Ever since I got an A on a 15-page research paper on AIM (and almost wrote my thesis on AIM), I almost feel like my fascination is legitimized. As a journalism and psychology major, it's not so odd to be preoccupied with exploring this strange world where privacy rarely exists and deciding whether or not to "go idle" is a big deal. Is it?

I know, I know. It's one thing to be curious about the psychology of AIM; it's another thing to spend more time thinking about what my next away message is going to be than, oh, just about anything else in the world. (Kidding. Obviously, I spend way more time planning the content of my profile than planning what's going in my away message.)

I'd like to fast forward ten years and see what my buddy list looks like. Will I have one? Probably ... well, maybe. It's just weird to think about.

Since we're basically the first generation to widely use IM and away messages, and it's becoming more and more common for households to have an ever-ready Internet connection, at what point will the extensively descriptive and/or melodramatic away messages stop? Will we read commentary like "Picking up the kids at soccer practice, then dropping them off at the 'rents' so I can have some alone time with the hubby [winking face]?" Will we recognize our friends' midlife crises not by the fancy new cars they drive, but by the sudden switch to depressing song lyrics in their profiles?

Since we're basically the first generation to widely use IM and away messages, and it's becoming more common for households to have an ever-ready Internet connection, at what point will the extensively descriptive and/or melodramatic away messages stop?

Yeah, it does sound pretty ridiculous. Part of me hopes that AIM won't be as ubiquitous when we finally "grow up." Part of me just doesn't want to grow up.

In the meantime, as Sally was right-clicking down my buddy list the other day I said, "I bet your kid will have a screen name by the time she's one year old."

She laughed. "Probably," she said. "And you know I'll be the one making up her away messages!"

(No, Sally, I thought the baby would be typing "Mmm, lunchtime, you know what that means! [winking face]" all herself.)

Oh, Sally. This summer I predicted (and she agreed) that when she's pregnant with her first child, and ready to dash to the hospital, she'd probably run (or waddle, perhaps) to her laptop first so she can change her away message.

Of course, she'll need a back-up plan in case she's not at home when the time comes. If she's at the supermarket because a watermelon-and-pickles craving hits, she can whip out her cell phone and phone a friend.

"Hi! I need to go to the hospital ... can you break into my apartment and change my away message from 'when is Lil' Subie gonna come out?! [angry face]' to 'In labor! Call the cell! [sunglasses-face]'? Oh, also, if you could let my husband know that I'm having contractions, that'd be cool. Thanks!"

Twenty hours later, her friends will call the cell. "Is it a boy or a girl?"

"It's a boy," she'll say. "How long have I been idle?"

There's always a place to turn

Paige Cram

It's a common misconception that, despite the vastness of this world with all its population density, each of us is alone in our journey through life. Joseph Conrad writes in, "Heart of Darkness," "We dream, as we live ... alone." I've been giving his words a lot of consideration in the past week and with all due respect to Mr. Conrad, I disagree.

We are most definitely not alone, and I don't mean that in the "there's life on other planets" sense. For all I know about science, there may be aliens out there, but we hardly need them when we're surrounded by billions of our own species. If you think about it that way, it's virtually impossible for any of us to ever be completely by ourselves.

The funny thing about us humans is that we are all amazingly self-centered. When something goes wrong in our lives, we immediately begin to think that our problems are unquestionably unique. Whether it's a death in the family, a best friend moving away, the end of a relationship or the loss of a pet, we often allow ourselves to believe that no one has ever experienced a pain like the one which we are experiencing. We honestly believe that no one else's suffering could be as severe. In reality, however, there is nothing that we can experience that is truly original. All of our stories, even the most tragic ones, have been lived out thousands of times before ... and yet, the world goes on.

It's very easy to feel alone in this world, which often seems to lack compassion, when you view yourself as the martyr in a world of people with perfect lives.

It's this dangerous belief of being isolated from the rest of "happy" society that gets people into trouble. It's very easy to feel alone in this world, which often seems to lack compassion, when you view yourself as the martyr in a world of people with perfect lives. We see only our own pain and neglect to consider the problems of others. When you start believing that no one could possibly understand, you run the risk of heading down a path from which there is no short-cut back.

Besides, the truth is that, everyone understands. When you start talking to people, friends, family, whoever, you realize that we are all human; we all feel the same emotions of love and joy, of loss and pain. And no matter what incredible cross you are trying bear alone, chances are that someone you know has already done it successfully. So do yourself a favor, admit that your problems are not so special because once you do that, the struggle to overcome them becomes much more of a fair fight.

The world that Conrad created may have granted him international fame, but a world where we can never be truly understood or connected to anyone is not one in which I would want to live. I much prefer to see the world as a place full of kindred spirits who are fighting their way through life, just like us. A place where you can always find a shoulder to cry on because everyone knows that they will someday need the favor returned.

This may sound idealistic to some of you, but take a look around. You'll see that my world is a much more accurate representation of reality. So when you find yourself falling into some of those potholes along the road of life, just remember that we are never alone. There are friends, family members and even strangers who are with us all along the way whether we realize it or not. And if you look close enough, you can probably see someone else's footprint in that exact same hole.

Buckley achieves life after death with 'Grace: Legacy Edition'

"Somebody asked me what I wanted to do with music, and I just said I wanted just to give back to it what it has given me."

— Jeff Buckley

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Touted as one of Rolling Stones Magazine's "500 Greatest Albums of All Time," the late Jeff Buckley's first album, "Grace," has been re-released to the delight of fans everywhere.

In spring of 1997, a 25-year-old Jeff Buckley went swimming with his friend Keith Foti at the Wolf River Marina in the Memphis Harbor shore. According to Foti, a towboat that had been passing caused a wash on the shore and Foti lost sight of Buckley. The body of Jeff Buckley was found and positively identified five days later. Ironically, Buckley's father famed folk musician Tim Buckley also passed away in the prime of his youth. Tim Buckley, however, succumbed to death after an overdose of heroin.

Three years before this tragic accident that claimed his life, Jeff Buckley, bassist Mick Grondahl, guitarist Michael Tighe, and drummer Matt Johnson, along with a host of other musicians recorded the studio E.P. "Grace." While the disc was released on the highly hyped Columbia Records, Buckley's first release did not initially reach a target audience; "Grace" did not go unrecognized. Buckley became popular in New York City. As a result of the NYC avant-garde club scene in the 1990's, he soon became a popular underground artist. Since then, the late musician has been considered by many as one of the most extraordinary musical talents of the present generation.

The full-length, full-band album, "Grace," was released in the United States on August 23, 1994. In April of 1995 the album was awarded France's Gran Prix International Du Disque, an honor that is given to recognized outstanding musical accomplishment. Journalists, producers, and the president of French Culture, among others decided upon the award. Past winners include Joni Mitchell, Bob Dylan, and Folk legend Joan Baez.

Though this would be the only LP release that Buckley would be able to witness, the legacy and success of the young artist would be left to his mother Mary Guibert. Luckily, Guibert has been able to help form five Jeff Buckley albums with archived recordings of her late son. Buckley's music has since been cited as a favorite of current successful artists like John Mayer, Radiohead and Coldplay.

Posthumously, the release of a double-CD entitled "Sketches For My Sweetheart the Drunk," was released on Columbia records in 1998. The album received massive critical acclaim and even was nominated for a Grammy Award in the Best Male Rock Vocal category.

Also since his death, Columbia who also plays guitar) mix acoustic strumming and emotive electric solos, managing to make both sound fresh. "Campaign of Hate" is Powell's shining moment; the song progressively builds up its tempo until the last 30 seconds, when Powell successfully chases down Doherty's galloping vocals.

The first single from "The Libertines," "Can't Stand Me Now," showcases the variety on the second album. The vocals have a slightly vaudevillian tinge (Doherty and Barat banter back and forth can't take you anywhere / wouldn't take you anywhere"), there's folksy harmonica, and Powell plays several solos on what seems to be a wooden block.

In addition to playing around with new instruments and techniques, the band manipulates the pacing of its songs differently on "The Libertines." While "Up the Bracket's" songs mostly hovered around the three minute mark, the Libertines experiment with shorter blasts of sound ("Arbeit Macht Frei" is 1:13) and longer songs with lots of relatively empty space ("Road To Ruin" is 4:21, two minutes of which have no vocals and are filled in with the other musicians' studio jam session).

Though the album sounds different than the Libertines' first, it's thematically similar. Continuing the tradition of "Up the Bracket," the Libertines show off the band's penchant for unexpected historical ("And the gate read: / Arbeit Macht Frei") and literary ("Well wouldn't it be nice to be Dorian Gray?") references. There are also sly digs at fellow members of their music scene: "Campaign of Hate" skewers "Poor kids dressing like they're rich (mods) / Rich kids dressing like they're poor (oh my god)."

The Libertines directly reference their debut at least twice. A line in "Don't Be Shy" jokes that "the bracket's higher now" and "The Man Who Would Be King" directly continues the story of "Tell It to the King" from "Up the Bracket." The two "King" songs share the same opening drum riff (a subtle hint at their connection) and a variation of the same first line ("I've got a little secret for ya" versus "Another secret for ya"), a not-so-subtle hint. The lyrics of both deal with the narrator's anxiety about being in charge and letting his life run out of control. Which brings us back to Doherty.

The Libertines examine what it means to fall down so far that eventually the only place left on the map left to explore is up. In pure yo-yo fashion, springing from the chaos of their past, they turn out a new work superior, albeit connected at its seams, to the original. Without the fleeting moments of insanity, the CD wouldn't sound like the scrappy British band fans have come to love. But it's the album's sophisticated development that catapults the Libertines past the hype they never got the first time around.

Grace remains in 'The Legacy Edition' release has released "Mystery White Boy – Live '95-'96," "Live at L'Olympia," "The Grace EPs," and "Songs to No One: '91-'92."

As for the success of "Grace," even Jeff Buckley himself could not have predicted the success of his first full-length endeavor. The album has sold over two million copies to date and has been certified Gold in the United States.

In order to pay tribute to Buckley, and honor the 10-year anniversary of the "Grace" album, Steve Berkowitz of Legacy Recordings A&R and Mary Guibert have produced the special reissuing of the album and added materials. The set includes the original album, additional unreleased tracks, and a DVD biography of the making of the album and the life of the artist.

The "Grace: Legacy Edition," disc is the first digitally remastered version of the disc since it's release. The album includes such Buckley staples as "Last Goodbye," "Lilac Wine," and the often-covered "Lover, You Should've Come Over." The new sound on the disc does not stray from the original, but it does offer a crisper version of the album.

The second of the three discs includes thirteen tracks compiled from some of Buckley's more rare studio performances, including extras from the original "Grace" recording sessions that took place in Bearsville Studios in Woodstock, New York.

The disc includes versions of Hank William's "Lost Highway," Bob Dylan's "Mama, You Been on My Mind," and even a version of his own tune, "Dream Brother" with alternate lyrics than what appeared on the initial release of "Grace." The ability to listen to Buckley share some of his affection for the music he loves is almost as remarkable as being able to hear the artist in the midst of his creative process. The hardcore Jeff Buckley fan will be impressed.

Also included on the second disc is a blues medly that Buckley plays with an acoustic guitar, and also a cover of the equally blues infused Nina Simone song, "The Other Woman." Buckley seemed to garner the ability to attack various musical genres in his career; these tunes demonstrate his natural brilliance and versatility in performance.

The third disc of the collection is a DVD produced by independent producer/director Ernie Fritz. This may possibly be the most remarkable addition to this collection. The DVD chronicles the life and career of one of the 1990's most intriguing artists. It weaves interviews, live performances, in-studio video recordings, and even four promotional music videos that were recorded to help support the release of "Grace."

The personal interviews with Buckley provide the most interesting look in to his creative ideals. He explained his passion for the art form and not the business and what plans he had for his music.

"What do I want people to get from the music? Whatever they want, you know. Whatever you like," he said.

Buckley also noted in the interview that music grabbed his attention at a very early age. He was intrigued by the creation of music early on in life, and had not been able to let go since.

"I was captured by music at an early age, " Buckley said. "It was my mother. It was my father. It was my plaything, my toy. It was the best thing in my life."

Buckley is both stirring and emotional in his description of his musical influences. His words on the subject leave the viewer with an understanding of what made Jeff Buckley tick. One gets the feeling that even if he had lived a thousand years, Jeff Buckley would have only had one love: music.

"Somebody asked me what I wanted to do with music, and I just said I wanted just to give back to it what it has given me, and to meet all the other people who are doing it … just to be in the world really."

As the film draws to an end, a performance of Buckley's, "Last Goodbye" graces the screen. While initially the song and rendition seem to be a bit of an eerie foreshadowing of his death and maybe a cheap and easy way to end the movie, the filmmakers made the correct decision to not end the movie there. Another scene where Buckley is very much alive and active ends the film, inferring that even in death, the life and art of Jeff Buckley will continue on.

This year marked the 10 year anniversary of the initial release of Jeff Buckley's "Grace."

to what's in front of you."

The Center for Mindfulness at the University of Massachusetts Medical School uses many techniques to teach mindfulness. One exercise involves taking 20 minutes to eat two raisins. Participants notice how the raisins look and smell. They feel the texture. And finally, they taste.

Mindfulness isn't alternative medicine, but complements traditional medicine, said Saki Santorelli, the center's director.

"This approach which used mindfulness was pretty radical when the program started," he said. "But we showed the medical community that it wasn't taking advantage of its greatest ally – the patients themselves.

The link to Buddhism isn't emphasized, he said.

"People who come to our clinic don't care about Buddhism or any -ism," he said. "They're suffering and want relief. Mindfulness helps them tap inner resources."

But some in the medical community say more scientific studies are needed to evaluate the benefits of mindfulness.

"Given the potential benefits and increasing popularity of mindfulness training, it seems critically important," Ruth Baer of the University of Kentucky's psychology department, wrote last year in a scholarly paper.

Being disciplined about meditating is the hardest challenge, many people say.

At the Maria Kannon Zen Center in Dallas, people gather every day to meditate. Executive Director Helen Cortes said 200 students may pass through in a year, but only a few will stick with it.

"Not everybody likes sitting still for 25 minutes or an hour," she said. "But there are other choices. People need to follow their own temperament to develop mindfulness."

She said sweeping the floor, mowing the lawn, washing dishes and even cleaning toilets can serve as mindfulness meditations.

"We remind people you wash dishes not in order to get them clean, but rather to simply wash the dishes," she said. "You feel the water, smell the soap, be aware of your body when you put the dishes away."

Scholars say concepts similar to mindfulness are found in other religions – the daily cycle of prayers said by Christian monks, Orthodox Jews and MuslimThese observances are ways of paying attention to the presence of God in all things.

The Rev. Frederick Schmidt of the Perkins School of Theology at Southern Methodist University said there's a vast difference between those who embrace mindfulness for spiritual reasons and those who don't.

"Meeting God is an entirely different proposition than managing my stress," he said.

Stuard, the former Buddhist monk, says mindfulness meditation goes hand in hand with his Christian faith.

"In Christian language, we see it as valuing every moment as sacrament," he said. "For Buddhists, mindfulness is the miracle of the present moment."

In his new book "Mindful Loving," Dr. Henry Grayson stresses the importance of breath. "Your breath draws you into the here and now," he says.

'Mindful Loving' author suggests living consciously

By Susan Hogan/Albach
The Dallas Morning News

Psychologist Henry Grayson says his book, "Mindful Loving," might not have been a bestseller if his publisher had stuck to a title he'd suggested: "The New Physics of Love."

Three months ago, Body & Soul magazine added the phrase, "The Natural Guide to Mindful Living" to its cover. Mindfulness – living consciously in the moment – has become "just that significant" in American culture, said editor-in-chief Seth Bauer.

Mindfulness books and tapes are frequent bestsellers. Mindfulness training is a staple at seminars, retreats and spas. Hospitals and psychologists are teaching mindfulness as a means to handle everything from chronic illness and addiction to stress and depression.

Even corporate America is on board. Some businesses now offer mindfulness workshops to improve concentration, employee relations and ethics. Last year, Spirituality & Health magazine featured an article titled, "Lessons from Mindful Corporations."

Experts say mindfulness is cultivated. The most common way is by sitting in quiet meditation and observing one's breath. Some people count breaths as they inhale and exhale. Others follow the rising and falling of the breath, or some other variation.

"The point of mindfulness meditation is not to zone out but to tune in," Stuard said.

The challenge comes when the mind drifts. Each time that happens, people are told to take notice, then return to their breath without judging their thoughts and emotions as good or bad.

"Your breath draws you into the here and now," said Dr. Grayson, the Mindful Loving author. "People are realizing that they spend so much of their lives worrying about the past or thinking about the future that they miss out on the present."

The point is to bring awareness to all aspects of life.

Whether practiced for spiritual, health or other reasons, mindfulness is all about conscious living. (If you've ever mindlessly stuffed yourself while watching TV, you know something about unconscious living.)

Mindfulness is integral to Buddhism, an ancient religion that has enjoyed waves of popularity in America.

In the 1960s, the influence of the Beat writers, such as Allen Ginsberg, became widespread.

The 1970s celebrated Robert Pirsig's "Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance."

In the 1990s, Hollywood stepped forward with "Kundun and Seven Years in Tibet."

And now, whenever the Dalai Lama visits, crowds befitting a rock star greet him.

Many say the seeds for the current mindfulness craze were largely planted by the 1975 book, "The Miracle of Mindfulness" by Thich Nhat Hanh, a Vietnamese Buddhist monk once nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize by Martin Luther King Jr.

"Mindfulness is the miracle by which we master and restore ourselves," wrote the monk, who lives in France.

For Buddhists, mindfulness is embedded in ethics and compassion.

"It's not just for ourselves, but for making the world a better place," Salzberg said.

Michael Sauvante shares that philosophy, though he isn't a Buddhist. He's the chief executive of Rolltronics, a Menlo Park, Calif., company identified as "mindful" by Spirituality & Health.

The corporation creates technology for flat panel monitors and other products.

In spiritual circles, mindfulness is a path to inner awakening. In the medical community, it's seen as a path to better health.

Psychologist Henry Grayson's new book "Mindful Loving" has become a national bestseller.

More than 200 U.S. hospitals and clinics use mindfulness training to promote mental and physical health.

Austin family physician Paul Keinarth, on the verge of burnout, turned to mindfulness meditation four years ago. Racing thoughts, worries and stress plagued him. He had difficulty sleeping. He was emotionally distant from his family.

"The change has been dramatic," said Keinarth, who now teaches mindfulness courses. "I'm living my own life as it unfolds now instead of living a lot of stories about what happened to me or to other people. My relationships to my family and to my patients have vastly improved."

Dr. James Ruiz, a radiologist from Baton Rouge, La., said his interest in mindfulness began when his 6-year-old son was an infant. When the baby would cry in the middle of the night, he would hold him while doing a walking mindfulness meditation.

Mindfulness has changed the way he parents, he said.

"Being up in the middle of the night with a child in distress is not what drives you to madness," he said. "What drives you crazy is that you want to be back in bed. Mindfulness is letting go of that, accepting the reality and attending

Libertines persevere

By Blair Rainsford
Tufts Daily

The Libertines' debut, "Up the Bracket," was released in 2002 at the tail-end of the "garage rock" phenomenon that blew up in the music press.

Maybe they weren't good looking enough (compared to the Strokes), or maybe they weren't kitschy enough (like the Hives), or maybe they were too good at playing their instruments (the Vines), but somehow the Libertines managed to avoid the deluge of hype (at least in the United States) that so many of their peers experienced.

Whatever the reason, most rock fans know at least two things about the Libertines by now: that former Clash founding member Mick Jones produces them and that lead singer Pete Doherty has had "difficulties" with the police. He was addicted to heroin and crack-cocaine and has been arrested for, among other things, carrying a switchblade and robbing bandmate Carl Bart's apartment.

It is hard to review the Libertines' new album (pulling a Weezer Green-Album-type stunt, they named their second CD "The Libertines") without mentioning drugs. Talking about Pete Doherty without talking about addiction is like trying to ignore the elephant in the room: the unintelligibly British, crack-smoking elephant.

The real Libertine addicts fans who couldn't get enough of "Up the Bracket"'s manic punk frenzy – are going to have to find a new drug, or at least adjust their habits for this self-titled sophomore effort. The most striking feature of "The Libertines" is what it's lacking: the unrestrained wildness of its first album.

Gone is Doherty's animalistic wail at the beginning of "Up the Bracket." In its place is the playful opening to "What Katie Did" ("shoop shoop, shoop de-lang de-lang"): perhaps an updated version of the Chiffons' "He's So Fine."

As Doherty switches into '60s pop mode, Barat (guitar and vocals), John Hassall (bass), and Gary Powell (drums) follow his lead and readjust accordingly. On "Music When the Lights Go Out," a slow ballad, Hassall and Powell (and probably Doherty,

Hamilton to keep gold medal

By Stephen Wilson
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) — Assisted by a laboratory's big blunder, Tyler Hamilton will be allowed to keep his Olympic cycling gold medal.

The International Olympic Committee dropped its investigation Thursday into a blood test from the Summer Games that showed Hamilton used a transfusion to boost his endurance. The decision was made only because the Athens lab mistakenly put his backup sample in a deep freeze — not because the IOC believes he was clean.

Hamilton, who declared he is "100 percent innocent," tested positive for blood doping on Aug. 14, after his time-trial victory. The finding, however, could not be confirmed because there were not enough intact red blood cells in the second sample, the IOC said.

An athlete is considered guilty of doping only when both samples from a drug test come back positive.

The last American to lose an Olympic gold medal for a drug violation was Jerome Young of the 1,600-meter relay team in 2000. He tested positive for the steroid nandrolone in 1999 and was stripped of his gold medal from the team, which included Michael Johnson.

Asked whether Hamilton had slipped through the net, IOC medical commission chairman Arne Ljungqvist said, "It's up to everyone to draw his own conclusions on that."

Although Hamilton's gold medal is safe, he is not completely in the clear.

Both blood samples taken from Hamilton at the Spanish Vuelta on Sept. 11 came back positive, his Swiss racing team Phonak said.

The tests allegedly showed evidence of a transfusion with blood from another person. Blood transfusions can boost endurance by pumping oxygen-rich red blood cells to the muscles.

It's up to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency and the International Cycling Union to decide whether to take action against Hamilton for the positive tests in Spain. If found guilty of blood doping, the 33-year-old cyclist could face a two-year ban from the sport.

Cycling spokesman Enrico Carpani said the federation would not comment until USADA had dealt with the case. The U.S. body, which handles cases involving American athletes, has 30 days to deliver its findings to the cycling federation, he said.

"This is a matter still being reviewed. As such, we're not in a position to comment," U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Darryl Seibel said Thursday. "We understand that if it is going to be adjudicated, it will be adjudicated by USADA (U.S. Anti-Doping Agency)."

Phonak plans to investigate the accuracy of the new tests.

"Since the new method is an effort based on probability and interpretation ... measurements, uncertainties will remain in this examination and procedure in any case," the team said.

Phonak said Hamilton is suspended from racing but remains on the team, pending the review. Hamilton, a former teammate of Lance Armstrong, could not be reached for comment after the IOC announcement. But earlier, in a statement on the Phonak Web site, he said, "I am sure that the gold medal that I worked so hard for will stay in my hands.

"I guarantee that I represented the United States of America as an honest, clean and proud athlete."

Hamilton said he would support the team's inquiry to "prove my innocence."

"I am confident that its result will bring me back to cycling soon so I can pursue my dream of winning the Tour de France," he said.

The IOC said it was informed Aug. 22 by the drug lab in Athens that Hamilton's blood sample produced a "suspicious result." A group of experts studied the case and concluded Sept. 16 that the sample was positive.

The IOC set up a disciplinary panel to deal with the matter. But the IOC was informed Wednesday that Hamilton's backup sample was "nonconclusive" and the panel dismissed the case.

UMass in must-win situation

in that span will be on October 2 against cross-state foe Boston College, its only Division I-A opponent on the schedule this season. That could potentially be UMass' third loss in a row in the middle of the season, and the Minutemen would likely need to win out in the rest of their schedule to gain a birth in the postseason.

They were able to qualify for the playoffs last season with a 10-2 regular season record. With the Division I-AA playoff system qualifications being as complicated as they are, UMass can ill afford to drop their third game so early in the year.

After Boston College, the Maroon and White will travel to Virginia to take on James Madison which was just added to the Sports Network Top 25 poll for the first time since 2002.

On October 16, the Minutemen will travel to Durham to take on New Hampshire, a program that knocked off Delaware in the first week of the regular season when the Hens were still ranked No. 1 in the country.

To prove they weren't a one-hit-wonder, the Wildcats defeated Division I-A opponent Rutgers in their second game of the season. Freshman quarterback Ricky Santos was named I-AA Offensive Player of the Week by The Sports Network thanks to his huge performance in UNH's comeback win over Rutgers.

After traveling to Rhode Island to wrap up their road trip, the Minutemen will return to McGuirk to take on Maine, who was picked to win the A-10 North Division. The Black Bears have already beaten SEC power Mississippi State but is untested in conference play to this point.

Following Maine, UMass has its most interesting opponent on the schedule with a road game at Northeastern. Massachusetts coach Don Brown left the Huskies in February to become head coach of the Minutemen, and he was forced to watch the first three games this season from the press box as a penalty due to contract violations.

As showcased, UMass' remaining schedule proves to be very tough, and last week's slipup against Richmond puts the Minutemen at an extremely pivotal point in the year already. Tomorrow's game could point UMass in one of two directions as they continue with their season.

A win would give them a sweep of the two teams that played for the championship last season and propel them into a game against Boston College.

A loss tomorrow could start a freefall towards the bottom of the Atlantic 10 before October even comes around.

It's time to play ball.

CROSS COUNTRY from page 8

be looking for another strong showing from Derosa and expects the team to perform well against the challenges that they will encounter against Syracuse. Last year's Orange County Classic was won by Binghamton University, who will not be attending this years meet.

The UMass men's cross-country team will also be competing in the Syracuse Big Orange Invitational against Syracuse, SUNY-Binghamton, and Niagara University. Last year was the first time that the Minutemen competed in this meet, and they placed second to Syracuse.

"Syracuse is a step above us," coach Ken O'Brien said. "They are a solid team that finishes between fifth and seventh in the Big East. They will be a challenge again this year as eleven of their top twelve runners returned."

O'Brien seemed focused on reversing last year's outcome at this week's event.

"We need to take our lessons from last week's race and enter the meet on Saturday with the intent to win. We need to step it up a notch," O'Brien said.

O'Brien's hopes are not unfounded.

"Last Saturday the team competed very well and ran with confidence. The times were as good as or faster than last year which is especially encouraging considering the adverse conditions," O'Brien said.

"I anticipate ups and downs in individual performances throughout the next few weeks, but hopefully as we build our consistency, we can continue our success," O'Brien said.

Green honors faith over sports made Greenberg a model for second-generation Jews struggling with similar issues at work.

Green, who sat out on Yom Kipper three years ago and ended a streak of 415 consecutive games played, is making an impact even as he considers doing it again in a more crucial situation for his team.

"In some ways it's a contribution not only to the American Jewish community but to America to have the spotlight on someone who is publicly responding to a question of his religious obligation," Abramowitz said. "That in itself is a gift for us all."

Green has 27 homers this season and is the most accomplished of 10 active Jewish players. He was among the 143 ballplayers honored at the Hall of Fame celebration. Another, former Oakland pitcher Ken Holtzman, told of his refusal to dress for a game on Yom Kippur in the 1973 playoffs against Baltimore.

He was surprised when a limousine arrived at his Baltimore hotel on Yom Kippur morning to whisk him to a synagogue, where he was escorted to the front row and welcomed by Orioles owner Jerry Hoffberger.

Holtzman must have found some blessings because he won the next game 2-1 with a three-hitter over 11 innings.

Ron Blomberg, who won trivia fame by becoming the first designated hitter, was also among the Jewish players celebrated by the Hall. In 1971 at Yankee Stadium against Cleveland, he, too, chose to sit out on Yom Kippur and became known as "the Sundown Kid."

"It was ... nearing sundown at home, tie game, two outs in the bottom of the ninth with a man on third base," Blomberg told the Long Island Press. "I'm up. If I don't do it, we go past sundown, and if we go past sundown, I'm going to have to leave. I hit a single to center field and we won the game. From that day on I was idolized by every Jew in the city."

Minutewomen look to continue winning ways against No. 6 UConn and Vermont this weekend

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

One of the biggest themes around this Saturday's Massachusetts women's field hockey game is streaks. The Minutewomen snapped a six game losing streak last Sunday with a 1-0 victory over Maine. Continuing their winning ways will be no easy feat as the No. 6 Connecticut Huskies (9-0) come to Amherst riding a nine-game winning streak of their own.

"Connecticut is strong. They're physical, they can hit the ball, they're skilled and they play with a lot of confidence," coach Patty Shea said.

The Huskies have good reason to be confident. On the defensive end, the Huskies have been stellar, allowing just four goals in their nine games this season and have shut out their opponents five times.

As good as the Connecticut defense has been, they have been as strong offensively, posting 37 goals so far this season. Even more remarkable is that 11 different Huskies have already posted goals in the 2004 campaign.

"They're all good," Shea said about the UConn offense. "Their skills are good, they can all hit the ball, they're strong and they're athletic. One of the critical things is at any time any one of them can come on to the field and do the job. Their frontline and midfield know how to score goals. They know how to put the ball in, and they can finish the one-on-ones. So they're all very dangerous."

While the Husky offense is very talented, senior forward Lauren Henderson is without question the focal point of the Connecticut offense. Henderson has 13 goals this season and will enter Saturday's game just one shy of tying UConn's all time record.

"Lauren Henderson is very dangerous when it comes to the corners," Shea stated. "She's the playmaker for them. She sets up a lot of things."

Coach Shea stressed two keys for a UMass victory. The first lies in the Massachusetts defense.

"Our defensive unit is very, very strong. I know we match up pretty well in regards to team speed. We have great athletes on our team as well. Defensively, we have a very strong opportunity to stop them because we play very well as a defensive unit," the UMass coach said.

In order for the Minutewomen to pull off the upset, they will need to remain patient on offense and move the ball down the field with precise ball control.

"We need to be patient to find the space around the Connecticut defenders to move around the field," Shea said. "You have to be patient to get it to their goal. You can't just go straight, straight straight, you have to work it down the field to get it to their goal. We need to connect on a few more passes, and that will be the tell all. Our forward line needs to step up their game a little bit."

One thing is certain; UConn's ranking will not intimidate the Minutewomen. UMass has faced more than its fair share of ranked opponents including No. 2 Maryland, No. 12 Boston College, No. 13 American and No. 16 Harvard. Coach Shea stressed the team's focus was not the rankings, or what is on paper but on executing on the field.

On Sunday, Massachusetts will square off against the Vermont Catamounts. UVM has lost eight of their last nine games, including a 4-0 loss to Connecticut.

Both games will be played at Garber Field.

Green keeps faith

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

Shawn Green is anguishing over the same conflict that confronted Hall of Famers Sandy Koufax and Hank Greenberg.

The game or the synagogue? A pennant race or prayers?

In Green's case, he's torn about missing two critical games for the Los Angeles Dodgers against the San Francisco Giants. The games will take place on the holiest of Jewish High Holy Days, Yom Kippur, which begins sundown on Friday and lasts until sundown on Saturday.

Should he play one game and abstain from the other, seeking a compromise in his commitments to his team and his faith? Should he play both games or attend services, fast and refrain from work in solemn observance of the Day of Atonement?

Will he be criticized one way or another? No doubt, but he has to answer only to himself.

"It's a really tough deal," Green said Wednesday night before the Dodgers lost to San Diego 4-0 and saw their NL West lead over San Francisco shrink to a half-game.

"I've bounced back and forth and am just trying to do the right thing. It's hard to know what that is. I've really been toying with two different options: Play one of them or not play at all. I will miss at least one game."

To play or not to play on Yom Kippur is a personal decision for a Jewish ballplayer that can have a larger impact.

"It strikes a chord with each one of us who has to wonder, 'What do I do in this situation? Do I go to work? Am I going to observe my faith in a very visible way? Or do I just go with the flow?'" said Rabbi David Fine, Pacific Northwest regional director for the Union for Reform Judaism.

Koufax and Greenberg won the everlasting affection of American Jews, and the respect of many non-Jews, by observing Yom Kippur rather than playing in big games – Koufax in the 1965 World Series as pitching ace of the Dodgers, Greenberg in the 1934 pennant race as the home run slugger for the Detroit Tigers.

"It's not quite a profile in courage, but it's still a courageous stand," said Fine, who grew up in Detroit hearing about Greenberg long after the last of his 331 home runs and his 58 in 1938. "It's when baseball players really become heroes in the eyes of those of us who watch them. It's when they go beyond good players to being real examples and role models."

Koufax attended synagogue in Minnesota instead of pitching in Game 1 of the '65 Series against the Twins. Don Drysdale pitched that day and gave up seven runs in 2 2-3 innings. When manager Walter Alston came out to pull him from the game, Drysdale cracked, "I bet right now you wish I was Jewish, too."

Greenberg wrestled with whether to play on Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year. He spoke to his rabbi about it, got a dispensation to play, and hit two homers that day. The Detroit Free Press ran a banner headline, in Hebrew, that read: "Happy New Year, Hank."

On Yom Kippur, the pennant not quite clinched, Greenberg sat. "Greenberg's decision electrified the American Jewish community, and generations of people remember that with incredible pride," said Martin Abramowitz, who recently helped the Hall of Fame organize "A celebration of Jews in baseball."

The world has changed in 70 years – Green doesn't have to face the same anti-Semitism that Greenberg did. But the issues are the same and it's still a matter of a man examining his principles and conscience.

"Greenberg's choice (was) how to balance loyalty to parents, religion, and tradition with commitment to his American profession and his desire to fully participate in American life," historian Peter Levine wrote.

High stakes on the line vs. Delaware

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It seems to be a little early in the season for the Massachusetts football team (2-1, 0-1 Atlantic 10) to be in a must-win situation, but that is the dilemma that the Minutemen have found themselves in as they are set to take on the Delaware Fightin' Blue Hens tomorrow at McGuirk Stadium.

UMass lost to Richmond at McGuirk last Saturday in a game the Minutemen clearly expected to win. Fresh off of taking care of some unsettled business in a victory over Colgate the week before, UMass may have come out a little too confident in the Richmond game, and it cost them an early season loss to a conference opponent.

With the Atlantic 10 being so strong from top to bottom this year (seven teams are nationally ranked this week), holding serve at home becomes that much more crucial, especially with UMass, ranked No. 9 at the time, so heavily favored against an unranked Richmond squad.

It may have also been a tough game for the Minutemen to get up for, since the schedule had Richmond sandwiched in between both teams that played in last season's Division I-AA national championship.

So this week, with the defending champs coming to Amherst, UMass faces a huge task in order not to fall to 0-2 in conference. The Minutemen will also be looking to avenge last season's 51-45 triple-overtime loss to the Fightin' Blue Hens down in Delaware.

If the Minutemen aren't able to outlast Delaware, they will fall to 2-2 with an even more daunting task ahead of them as they head out on the road for four consecutive weeks.

UMass cross-country heads to Syracuse

By Eric Athas and Martha Powers
Collegian Correspondents

Pouring rain may cause some to stay indoors, but it did not slow down the Massachusetts women's cross-country team last Saturday. Led by freshman standout Christina Derosa, the team won the UMass Invitational in rough weather conditions.

"I was pleased with the girls' performance considering the weather," coach Julie Lafreniere said. "They ran with a lot of heart and courage, and I am proud of them for that."

Derosa, who placed first, overall, finishing the 3-mile course with a time of 18:12, anchored the win. Not far behind came Cuisle Kierans (18:30), who was second among UMass runners. Amanda Dahlberg (18:35) and Alexis Anzelone (18:38), who were third and fourth, respectively.

Tricia Silva (19:09), Kara Gilette (19:10) and Ashley Davidson (19:13) crossed the line within seconds of each other, making seven of the top 13 runners from UMass.

Like the rain a week ago, tomorrow the team faces yet another natural challenge at the Orange Cross County Classic at Drumlins Golf Course in Syracuse. The terrain there is hilly, and the climate tends to bring with it harsh winds. However, Lafreniere is confident that the challenging course will not get the better of the girls.

"Last year, there was a lot of wind, and I'd rate the course as very challenging. But I don't think it will beat up our runners," Lafreniere said. "We are really going to have to perform, not only because of the course, but also because Syracuse is a really strong program."

While other schools will be attending the meet, it is Syracuse that is expected to give UMass the most trouble. Lafreniere will

Higgins, SGA under fire

Photos of speaker and other representatives cause furor

By Erika Lovley & Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials are investigating photographs taken of nine UMass student representatives drinking alcohol in the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy office and making references to the Ku Klux Klan.

The pictures, posted on the website of SCERA Student Coordinator Brian Roberts, were first revealed to an unspecified member of the ALANA (African Latino Asian/Pacific Islander and Native American) Caucus Friday evening.

The photos were taken on March 29, the same day Speaker of the Student Government Association Patrick Higgins — then the Chairman of Ways and Means Committee — lost the presidential election to Eduardo Bustamante.

The photos show senators, SGA and SCERA members drinking alcoholic beverages and playing card games in the SCERA offices, as well as a caricature drawn on a dry erase board fashioned to resemble Higgins. The figure holds a burning cross, wears a pointed hat, a cape and a shirt that reads "Grand Wizard". Above, the words "I love ALANA" float in a word bubble.

According to Brian Roberts, the photos were allegedly removed from the Internet last July. However, once ALANA members discovered the pictures Friday evening, copies began circulating by email throughout the UMass administration, faculty and student body.

In a phone interview with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano said he has already launched a full investigation involving the Deans Office, as well as University police.

"That [SCERA] office is to be used for University official business and student business," he said. "I don't see anywhere in the bylaws were its to be used to have a party."

Before meeting with his cabinet yesterday afternoon, Gargano said that as a senior University administrator, he found the photos disturbing and disgusting, and caused him to question the functionality of the SCERA office.

Gargano said he has noticed a continuing pattern of disturbing acts on campus — the defacing and destruction of a Holocaust memorial last year when students threw flags into the Campus Pond, and the recent vandalism of the Metawampe Native American statue that sits on the Metawampe Lawn by the Campus Pond.

"There's a lot more at play that actually lead to whatever happened in that room," he said. "My hunch is that there are other photos out there floating."

Gargano said that an investigation and reevaluations of all the student agencies might be in the future.

"We have to take a step back and rethink all these agencies," he said. "They were originally formed with a certain mission, and we need to see how close we still are to that mission."

Higgins apologized for his behavior in the disturbing photographs posted online during a phone interview with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Higgins, who was notified late Friday evening about the publicity of the photographs, said he is ready to take full responsibility.

"I was being accused of being a racist last year," he said, "and that night we were making a joke about it — that I am not in any way

Sunderland blaze determined to be arson

An early morning blaze burns near the Dove's Nest Restaurant in Sunderland on Saturday. Fire officials have ruled that the fire was intentionally set. No injuries were reported.

By Erin Whitney
Collegian Correspondent

SUNDERLAND — Firefighters battled a fire intentionally set a few feet from a restaurant's propane tank on Saturday morning, narrowly preventing an explosion in the Sunderland Shopping Center.

Residents of Squire Village, located just behind the plaza, reported hearing a small explosion from the direction of the Sunderland Shopping Center just before 2 a.m. on Saturday.

"It woke me out of my sleep," said one bystander. "My god, at least they got it under control."

The Sunderland Fire Department arrived on scene at just after 2 a.m., and the Deerfield Fire Department followed shortly afterwards.

The fire had started in a wooden shed, which was used as storage space by the Dove's Nest eatery. The shed was about five feet away from a propane tank used by the restaurant's kitchen. Firefighters extinguished the blaze before the tank exploded, but scans with a thermal imager showed the tank as dangerously overheated.

The rear corner of the central building in the complex also started to smolder in the heat of the fire. Firefighters carefully checked the wood-roofed building, which had no firewalls to ensure that the fire had not spread further.

The central building, which contains seven local businesses, was relatively undamaged; the storage shed, which held financial records and register receipts for the Dove's Nest, is a complete loss. Only the blackened, collapsed skeleton of the building remains.

The Dove's Nest was closed on Saturday while the fire department ensured that the building was safe, but reopened for business on Sunday.

The fire has been ruled arson and has been confirmed as the cause of the shopping center blaze, according to Sunderland Fire Chief Robert Ahearn. "It definitely didn't start on its own," Ahearn said.

Another fire also started simultaneously behind Apartment 7 in Squire Village.

These fires are the latest in a series of arson fires that began over the summer in Sunderland. The fire department is offering a reward through the State Fire Marshall's office for information on the arsonist.

Bush talks to UN, Kerry lays out his plan for terrorism

By Gabriel Dye
Collegian Staff

Last week, President Bush spoke to the United Nations General Assembly in his Fourth Annual Address, according to the New York Times.

Without mention of casualties or increasing setbacks, he defended the war in Iraq and assured that "the people of Iraq have regained sovereignty."

At the same time, he called for greater U.N. support.

"The U.N. and its member nations must ... do more to help build an Iraq that is secure, democratic, federal and free," Bush said. The Assembly remained silent throughout the speech, but politely applauded at the end.

Later in that week, Prime Minister Ayad Allawi of Iraq visited Washington. He stood next to Bush in the White House Rose Garden and echoed the President's position on the current situation. Both Bush and Allawi stressed that Iraq will hold free elections in January.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld commented that due to persistent violence, Iraqi elections might be limited to certain areas.

"Let's say you tried to have an election, and you could have it in three-quarters or four-fifths of the country, but some places you couldn't because the violence was too great, well, that's so be it," said Rumsfeld.

Both Bush and Allawi granted that the elections "may not be perfect."

"You can understand it's tough and still be optimistic," Bush said.

While Bush continues to describe Iraq as a success, often refraining from comments on set backs and violence, Democratic nominee John Kerry presents a view of an Iraq in desperate need of help, torn by bombings and beheadings. He claims that Bush is "living in a fantasy world of spin."

Kerry said that as President, he would focus on the war on terror.

"The invasion of Iraq was a profound diversion from the battle against our greatest enemy — al-Qaeda," Kerry said last week. "Iraq is now what it was not before the war — a haven for terrorists."

On Friday, Kerry presented his most detailed plan-to-date on fighting terrorism.

According to Kerry's official website (www.JohnKerry.com), the seven-point proposal includes plans to "deny terrorists the weapons they seek by securing nuclear materials worldwide," "cut off terrorist finances and... make homeland security a real priority," and to "prevent terrorists from poisoning more minds."

As both candidates present opposing views and opinions on the dominant theme of the 2004 election — Iraq — the public will have a chance this Thursday to see them debate foreign policy side by side.

Finally, after weeks of disagreements, Kerry and Bush lawyers have agreed to a contract detailing three 90-minute debates. The contract outlines that the two candidates may not speak directly to each other, that they may not move from behind their respective podiums, and other stipulations including placement of warning lights when a candidate has exceeded his response time limit.

The first debate, which will focus on foreign policy and domestic security, is scheduled for Thursday, Sept. 30 and will be aired from the University of Miami in Coral Gables, Florida.

President Bush speaks at a recent White House press conference.

Sen. John Kerry delivers a speech on Iraq and U.S. foreign policy at New York University in New York on September 20.

Key Iraqi commander arrested on having ties to insurgents

By Fisnik Abrashi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Two car bombs wounded American and Iraqi troops west of the capital Sunday and a few hours later the U.S. military announced the arrest of a senior Iraqi National Guard commander on suspicion of ties to insurgents, underscoring the challenges to building a strong Iraq security service capable of restoring stability.

The two attackers who died in the twin blasts tried to ram their cars into a National Guard base in Kharma, a town on the outskirts of the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, a U.S. military official said on condition of anonymity.

The number of U.S. and Iraqi casualties was not immediately clear, but a statement from the U.S. Marines said there were no serious injuries among American troops at the base.

The National Guard is the centerpiece of U.S. plans to turn over security responsibilities after elections slated for January and guardsmen have been targeted repeatedly by insurgents who are trying to undermine Iraq's interim government and drive out the U.S.-led coalition.

But the threat may not only come from outside the force. Guard Brig. Gen. Talib al-Lahibi, who previously served as an infantry officer in Saddam Hussein's army, was detained Thursday in the province of Diyala, northeast of Baghdad, a U.S. military statement announced.

The statement provided no details, but said he was suspected of having links to militants who have been attacking coalition and Iraqi forces for 17 months. Al-Lahibi was the acting head of the Iraqi National Guard for Diyala province, said Maj. Neal O'Brien, spokesman for the U.S. Army's 1st Infantry Division.

Meanwhile, an Egyptian diplomat and two British Muslim leaders urged religious leaders here to help secure the release of hostages.

Egyptian official Farouq Mabrouk sought help for six Egyptian telecommunications workers abducted with four Iraqis last week. Mabrouk refused to speak to reporters after his 30-minute meeting with Harith al-Dhari, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars, a conservative organization that has helped win the release of other foreign captives.

Gunmen abducted two of the Egyptians on Thursday in a raid on their firm's Baghdad office, the latest in a string of kidnappings targeting engineers working on rebuilding Iraq. Eight other employees, four Egyptians and four Iraqis, were seized outside of Baghdad on Wednesday.

Two senior officials of the Muslim Council of Britain were in Baghdad seeking freedom for hostage Kenneth Bigley, a British civil engineer kidnapped Sept. 16 with two Americans who were later beheaded.

After meeting with Muslim and Christian leaders, Daud Abdullah and Musharraf Hussain told reporters, "We cannot hold a British citizen responsible for what (British Prime Minister) Tony Blair did."

A posting on an Islamic Internet site Saturday claimed followers of Jordanian terror mastermind Abu-Musab al-Zarqawi had killed Bigley, but the British Foreign Office said the claim was not credible.

Bigley's brother, Paul, said Sunday he was told the captive was still alive.

"I have received information this evening that Ken is alive," Paul Bigley said by video link to a gathering at the Brighton, England, conference of Blair's Labour Party.

He provided few details, but he urged Blair to make a personal plea for his brother's release.

"All I am asking is for communication," Paul Bigley said. "Just simply send a bloody fax pleading for my brother's life."

Earlier Sunday, Blair said his government was doing everything it "properly and legitimately" could to secure Ken Bigley's release. The prime minister's office said Blair phoned the Bigley family again Sunday, as he did earlier in the week.

Yasser el-Sirri, head of the London-based Islamic Observation Center, told The Associated Press his organization appealed Thursday to al-Zarqawi's Tawhid and Jihad group to free Kenneth Bigley after the British government rejected its demands to free Muslim women from jail.

"We have received a positive answer that the group will consider our appeal when they decide his fate, and they confirmed that he is alive," said el-Sirri, whose organization often is a reliable source of information on Muslim militants.

Pressed on how he received the information on Kenneth Bigley, el-Sirri would only say it was "through a mediator in Iraq."

Paramilitary police killed suspected al-Qaida operative

By Zarar Khan
Associated Press

KARACHI, Pakistan (AP) — Para-military police killed a suspected top al-Qaida operative wanted for alleged involvement in the kidnapping of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, during a four-hour shootout Sunday at a southern Pakistan house, the information minister said. At least two other men were arrested.

Amjad Hussain Farooqi was wanted for his alleged role in the kidnapping and beheading of Pearl in 2002 and two assassination attempts against President Gen. Pervez Musharraf in December 2003.

"I as chief spokesman for the government of Pakistan confirm that our forces have killed Amjad Hussain Farooqi," Information Minister Sheikh Rashid Ahmed told The Associated Press by phone from Amsterdam, where he has gone on an official trip with Musharraf.

Ahmed said "two or three other people were also arrested during a big gunfight." He declined to identify them but said they were still being questioned by authorities and were "very important."

"This is the work of our security agencies, and they have done a great job," Ahmed said.

An intelligence official in Karachi identified the arrested men as Abdul Rehman and Yaqoob Farooqi. It was not clear what relation, if any, Yaqoob Farooqi had to Amjad Hussain Farooqi. Other officials could not

International Programs Office hosts the Education Abroad Fair

By Erin Corcoran
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts International Programs Office Education Abroad Fair takes place tonight in the Campus Center Auditorium from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m.

The Education Abroad Fair is a seminar created for students to inform them of their travel options while attending the University. UMass coordinators, as well outside vendors, will provide students with information and options for the wanderer and the curious alike. According to organizer JoAnn Bernhard, Associate Director of Education Abroad, UMass has many different international connections between schools waiting to be utilized by eager students.

According to Bernhard, whether students have a minor curiosity to look at the options available or an interest in traveling, studying, or working in another country, the fair is not only about studying abroad.

Volunteering abroad will also be addressed.

"Education occurs in more ways than just study," said Bernhard.

Vernacular holds the term as "studs abroad," but it is not inclusive to just 'studying' alone, and that is a crucial fact to keep in mind. By naming the event The Education Abroad Fair, Bernhard says the International Programs Office hopes to "broaden the concept" of what it means to study abroad.

There is the traditional studying abroad for undergraduates, but graduate students can also apply for work abroad. Aside from those two options, programs for volunteering abroad include short term and long summer programs.

A student can spend a semester, a year, or even a January abroad. "[There are] a variety of opportunities in all majors at all levels," said Bernhard.

Students can expect to feast their eyes on a wide variety of programs. Slated are 27 outside providers, as well as the 85 exchanges and study abroad programs readily available through the University. As an added convenience, the STA Travel group will be present tonight, and will be raffling off airline ticket vouchers.

At the fair, students can have their choice of traveling to countries on all six continents — or more accurately — anywhere in the world that they choose.

Operative linked to U.S. journalist's disappearance

immediately confirm that information.

However, Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao said three associates of Farooqi, all Pakistanis, were arrested.

Pakistan is a key ally of the United States in its war against terrorism and has arrested more than 600 al-Qaida suspects, including several senior figures in the terror network. Many of them have been handed over to U.S. authorities.

Since mid-July, Pakistan says it has arrested at least 70 terrorist suspects, including Mohammed Naeem Noor Khan, an alleged al-Qaida computer expert, and Ahmed Khalfan Ghailani, a Tanzanian suspect in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in east Africa that killed more than 200 people.

Earlier Sunday, intelligence officials said authorities launched a raid on the house in Nawabshah, a town about 125 miles northeast of the main southern city of Karachi, after police received a tip that Farooqi was hiding there.

Two men who tried to flee, one of whom was injured in the gunbattle, were arrested, said local police official Ismail Jamali, adding that intelligence officials led them away in blindfolds.

A paramilitary official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the siege lasted four hours.

The official said the suspect who was killed, presumably Amjad Hussain Farooqi, had shouted in Urdu, the main language in Pakistan, that he'd prefer death to capture. The suspect also pointed to the sky and shouted, "I fulfilled my promise to Allah," he said.

One woman and two children were also taken from the house. Firefighters were called to put out a blaze in one room that broke out during the gunbattle.

After a search, officials left the house carrying three boxes. It was not immediately clear what they contained.

Farooqi was believed to have been an associate of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the reputed al-Qaida No. 3 captured in Pakistan last year.

Farooqi had been missing since Pearl was abducted in Karachi in January 2002.

Pearl's captors beheaded the journalist and released a videotape of the killing. Four Islamic militants have been convicted of his kidnapping but seven other suspects, including those who allegedly slit his throat, remain at large.

Farooqi, thought to be 32, was born in a village in eastern Punjab province. His family says he was radicalized by a visit to Kashmir, where he trained with Islamic militants fighting against Indian security forces. He later visited Taliban-ruled Afghanistan.

"We pray to God Almighty to accept my brother's sacrifice," Mohammed Javed, Farooqi's elder brother, told the AP by phone from the village.

Javed said the government had not informed them about Farooqi's death, and he demanded that the body be returned to allow its burial according to Islamic ritual.

Javed said the family did not know whether Farooqi had been involved in acts of terrorism.

Gargano: 'A picture is worth a thousand words' shape or form a racist. We were drawing on the insults of the absurdity of me being a racist."

Higgins admitted that what he did was wrong and insensitive, but he did not intend to make anyone in the student body feel uncomfortable.

"I don't think that anyone can be better than anyone else," he said, "from homosexuals to Jewish people to the KKK — I'm really hurt by it, thousands will be offended."

Higgins says he wants to make himself accessible to the student community and send out a "heartfelt apology."

"I want to make people at ease and I want them to know the context it was in," he said, "but I have to realize what may be a joke to some people, to others it is offensive. Hopefully we will learn something from this — this was a stupid incident that was insensitive."

Higgins said that he has spoken to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Michael Gargano, who is concerned about the situation.

"[Gargano] is concerned this isn't good for the University," Higgins said, "he feels that the students might feel uncomfortable. I explained my intentions and he agreed that I have some work to do."

Higgins, who spent the weekend in Boston, plans to speak to students this morning individually. However, he told The Collegian that he was not prepared to comment on any of the legal implications that could erupt from underage drinking in a University office.

Coordinating Council member and ALANA caucus chair Pavel Payano said he was not surprised at the photographs, and claimed that he even expected this from certain SGA members.

"I am personally not surprised, but ALANA is shocked. They see it as this horrible act and it is, but I'm just not surprised," he said.

Payano said that there has been no formal apology to ALANA from any of the parties involved in the photographs, although he app-roached Roberts last night and asked him if he was planning on resigning.

"Roberts isn't planning on resigning and he is running for Senate," said Payano, "if he isn't resigning, that means that no one else will and these people will get elected."

ALANA members expressed anger and anguish in an email sent out to all members Saturday morning.

"We can't let these people keep their positions in our student government. We can't tolerate such blatant racism and irresponsibility at our school," the email read.

ALANA members, outraged over the SCERA office photographs, met yesterday afternoon at the Malcolm X Center to discuss the photographs with members of the SGA and the administrators, as well as members of the faculty.

Gladys Franco, an ALANA member and graduate assistant of ALANA affairs, spoke yesterday on behalf of the members.

"This is a sad moment and it shouldn't be taken lightly. [The photos' subjects] need to be punished," Franco said, "this isn't healthy for any of us."

Members sent around a petition that they hope to present to the administration, requesting the removal of the all the SGA members shown in the pictures.

Franco said she hopes that the photographed members will resign out of morality, but fears that they will not.

"I'm hoping that they will step down because we have no trust in them anymore," she said.

Jeff Napolitano, secretary of press relations for the SGA, admitted that he was shocked at the photos but wants to use this incident as an opportunity to spread awareness of racial issues on campus.

"It's not like there were a bunch of drunk kids making racist comments," Napolitano said, "they are supposed to be the leaders and the representatives of our campus. They were SGA members, SCERA members — we should let this remind people that this isn't isolated and these people shouldn't be scapegoats for the lack of diversity on this campus."

Napolitano also said he found the caricature of Higgins to be ironic.

"I love ALANA was like Higgins' mantra last year," he said, "and to the right of it [the dry erase board], there was a poster for 'Black History Month' and a 'March against racism' poster."

Gargano also spoke at the impromptu meeting.

"I am absolutely disgusted and appalled that something like this could happen here," he said, "we have already begun an investigation on a variety of issues. We will get to the bottom and we're going to charge them with everything we possibly can. There is zero tolerance, we will take swift decisive action."

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante said he wants this incident to be a wake-up call to the UMass community.

"These students are still student leaders and I am disgusted and shocked," he said, "I hope this is a wake-up call ... I have full confidence that this is going to move us forward."

Arrest made in hit and run

By Erika Lovley & Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts junior was arrested Friday morning and after hitting a pedestrian on Commonwealth Avenue and leaving the scene, according to UMPD Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald.

Heather M. Winchester, 21, of Billerica, Mass., struck 19-year-old Clara Tran of Dorchester, Mass., at approximately 2:50 a.m., while driving south. Tran, a freshman, was listed in critical condition by the Amherst Fire Department upon her arrival at Bay State Medical Center.

Winchester is charged with operation under the influence of liquor with negligence in operation resulting in serious injury, leaving the scene of an accident, and operation under the influence of alcohol.

According to Archbald, Tran and three friends were walking south in the right lane after parking a car near the Mullins Center when she was struck by Winchester's 1994 dark green Subaru, throwing her onto the hood. Winchester then fled the scene. Police were unable to determine the speed of the vehicle.

According to Lieutenant Robert Thrasher, Winchester was leaving a party at the time of the accident.

"She was driving home from a party in North Amherst ... She saw her [Tran] last minute and tried to pull around," he said.

"She [Tran] was bleeding heavily and conscious but not coherent," Archbald said. "The vehicle didn't stop."

Tran was immediately transported to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield by Amherst Fire Department. The extent of her injuries was not available at press time.

UMPD made an extensive search of all parking lots on the UMass campus and found Winchester's vehicle in Lot 11 with extensive right front damage to the fender, hood, and a "spider web" windshield that matched shattered glass left behind at the scene. The vehicle was secured by Massachusetts State Police and UMPD.

Police responded to the door of Winchester's dorm room, but were unable to gain access because there was no answer at the door. Police stood outside the door and secured the room for several hours until Winchester opened the door and emerged.

Winchester voluntarily came to the station when asked for an interview by police, where she was later arrested. The UMPD detective bureau is still investigating the incident.

Baystate Medical Center officials said Tran is no longer in critical condition but is still in the hospital. Her condition was unavailable at press time.

Disheartening photos raise serious questions

The Student Government Association is arguably the most embattled student organization at the University of Massachusetts, and to some extent, that largely comes with the territory; politicians are some of the most polarizing figures in our society.

The list of conflicts involving the SGA would fill this page, and it is more than likely that the balance of fault would end up right in the middle, between the organization and the bodies with which it has clashed.

However, the abominable photos that surfaced this weekend, some of which can be found in today's Collegian, are possibly the most damning evidence against the SGA in the last decade. Charges of racism and malfeasance have been swirling around Speaker Patrick Higgins and the other individuals who appear in the photos, and will certainly continue and intensify over the next week as the full story comes to light.

What we know is this: according to an email sent to members of the ALANA caucus, and a website linked in the email, Brian Roberts, the student coordinator of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, posted a series of pictures that are purported to have been taken the night before the 2004 SGA Presidential Election.

The pictures depict a group of individuals, all identified in the email as members of SCERA and/or the SGA, drinking, playing cards, and in the case of Higgins and SCERA member Timothy Daly, posing in front of a whiteboard drawing that shows Higgins in a pointed hood and cape, holding a burning cross, saying "I love ALANA." There are plenty of other photos with at least eight other SCERA and SGA members drinking beer. The photos were clearly taken in the SCERA office.

The fallout from this will last for weeks, and may likely result in resignations and even expulsions from the university. The context of the photos is disputed, and will most likely become known once all parties have had a chance to react. So the question becomes, where do we go from here?

While the wrongdoing by public officials is obviously displayed by the photographs, the racism charges have much more dimension, and will ultimately be decided by the community. However, even for those who don't feel offended or angered by the pictures personally, every student on this campus must be outraged at what these pictures represent.

The SGA is a representative voice on this campus. In fact, it is in many ways the premier advocacy group for the student body. Any chance for improvement of student life will fall on the SGA's shoulders, and anything done by the administration or other bodies to restrict our ability to enjoy our time here is the SGA's fight.

The members of the student government are picked from among our population, and they are supposed to represent our best and brightest when it comes to governance. These pictures have proven conclusively that the students' interest is not being fully upheld within the SGA, that we are not being represented in a professional, competent manner. It is up to each and every individual student to decide if he or she is personally offended by the content of the photos, but no matter what, we all should be shocked and dismayed by this single fact: the SGA has failed to uphold its mission to advocate for students, and the ramifications of that fact will most certainly be dire.

Playwright sparks plagiarism debate

Allison Edles

Plagiarism has become such a huge ordeal in today's society. One would think that, with all the legal penalties and severe repercussions it would have to one's career, the occurrences would be less frequent, if not as blatant. The New York Times recently released charges of plagiarism toward Bryony Lavery, an English playwright who wrote this year's Tony-nominated play "Frozen." Lavery is just one of the many public figures that have within the past few years been accused of committing obvious acts of plagiarism. The bottom line is that in this day and age it can be very easy to point fingers and cry "plagiarism." However, the situation should never come close to that accusation and many of today's public figures should know better.

Lavery was accused of 12 instances of plagiarism in her play that were taken from a New Yorker profile written by Dr. Dorothy Otnow Lewis on Malcom Gladwell in 1997 and from Lewis' book entitled "Guilty by Reason of Insanity". Lewis' lawyer, Martin Garbus, had claimed to an Associated Press reporter that "had she asked for material, we would have given it to her, but what she has done is a theft." In the grand tradition of plagiarism that went too far without being caught, her play has been nominated for a 2004 Tony award.

While it's easy to say that one was "inspired" by a novel or published story, it's completely different and downright unacceptable to adopt those ideas as your own. Lewis is, as a result of the incident, asking for credit where credit is due, including a public announcement regarding the articles plagiarized.

Another incident of plagiarism that has seen the light of the news was with the many novels written by Stephen Ambrose, a best-selling historian. Ambrose's works include the novel "Band of Brothers", which was turned into an HBO mini-series by Steven Spielberg and Tom Hanks. His situation was somewhat different from Lavery's where, in Lavery's case, she neglected to acknowledge the use of other sources for her play. In Ambrose's novels, specifically Citizen Soldiers and Nixon: Ruin and Recovery 1973-1990, Ambrose cited his sources in footnotes, but didn't correctly site it within the text. Ambrose neglected the use of quotation marks when whole passages of text were lifted from his sources. According to an article published by Forbes Magazine back in 2002, the author of one of Ambrose's sources, Joseph Balkoski who wrote Beyond the Beachhead. "He will footnote me, but the writing is either identical or subtly changed without using quotation marks." Ambrose later when on to publicly acknowledge his mistake and apologize.

As much as many students dread taking entry-level college writing courses, Ambrose's mistakes make it even more important for those courses to be in existence and teach how proper citations and attributions are to be made.

One other mainstream case of plagiarism that occurred within the past year was Jayson Blair of the New York Times who fabricated many articles about the war in Iraq, making up quotes and information, writing many of the compelling stories about American soldiers in the battlefield from his own apartment in New York City. Once again, this situation was also unique in the sense that, while Blair was writing blatantly incorrect articles, the Times knowingly still printed the materials, even though some of his information was taken from other sources as well, such as the Washington Post. Blair has since resigned from the Times, but the impression he has made on that publication and the rest of its readers is everlasting.

There are many varying degrees of plagiarism and what can be considered as such. Among college students, oftentimes the line is slightly blurred because of lenient professors who may or may not require a properly-cited paper with a works cited page for every essay they assign. If the consequences are not made to be real, if that notion of "oh, that will never happen to me" is condoned and not countered, then more and more instances of plagiarism will be excused and let to pass. One way to remedy the situation is for professors to have their students hand in a properly-cited essay, including a page of sources written correctly, and enforce the dangers and consequences of such an offense.

Lavery is just one of many writers out there who will be experiencing many hellish days that are lined up in the distance. Her career will be drastically affected by the accusations made, all of which could have been prevented. Hopefully, this will pose as yet another sad example of the dangers of plagiarism.

A disease we must not forget

Matthew Reid

If someone asked you what disease affects more than 4.5 million Americans of all races, genders and cultures, and costs over $1 billion a year to fight, you would probably answer AIDS or lung cancer. The correct answer, however, would be Alzheimer's disease. It is a "silent killer," going virtually unnoticed when compared to other diseases of similar magnitude. However, great strides are being made in fighting the disease.

The American Alzheimer's Association website defines the disease as a "disorder that destroys cells in the brain, which is the leading cause of dementia, a condition that involves gradual memory loss, decline in the ability to perform routine tasks, disorientation, difficulty in learning, loss of language skills, impairment of judgment, and personality changes."

The website goes on to describe the AAA's mission as, "eliminating Alzheimer's disease through the advancement of research and enhancing care and support for individuals, their families, and caregivers."

One of the most impacting and noticeable events that the AAA puts on is the Memory Walk. In Massachusetts, a total of ten walks are scheduled for September and October of this year. Over the summer, while working as a staff writer for my hometown's paper, I had the privilege of working on a preview for the Northern Quabbin Valley Memory Walk, which was scheduled to take place in Athol, MA on Saturday, Sept. 18. The Athol walk alone has raised tens of thousands of dollars towards Alzheimer's research in the past five years.

While I was interviewing people for the memory walk preview, I encountered several interesting people that made me think of Alzheimer's disease in ways I had never considered before. Hearing stories about Alzheimer's sufferers made me rethink every preconceived notion I held about the disease. Not being close to anyone with Alzheimer's, I had little personal experience to form a valid opinion. However, after spending time with Alzheimer's patients, and talking with family caregivers, I realized that this disease is not talked about, not funded, and not recognized nearly as much as it should be.

It is important to understand why Alzheimer's disease is not at the forefront of people's minds when they think about the most damaging diseases. There is no doubt that cancer and AIDS are horrible diseases, and worthy of a great deal of attention and research. However, with both diseases generating such a reaction from the public, it leads to other serious diseases, such as Alzheimer's, to get lost in the shuffle.

After spending time with Alzheimer's patients, and talking with family caregivers, I realized that this disease is not talked about, not funded, and not recognized nearly as much as it should be.

Another reason is that Alzheimer's disease is not as noticeable as cancer and AIDS. Someone who has gone through chemotherapy, for example, shows noticeable signs of treatment. It's easy to see someone who has lost all of their hair, or all of their weight, or someone who looks sickly in general, and feel sympathy for them. Alzheimer's disease, on the other hand, is a different case. It is a disease that affects the mind, and is only noticeable if you speak one-on-one with the individual. It's easy to ignore a disease of this nature, whereas other more "in-your-face" diseases are almost impossible to ignore.

Alzheimer's disease is also one of the most misunderstood diseases out there. People think that the only warning sign is memory loss, and in fact that is one of the most common symptoms. However, other warning signs include difficulty with language, extreme changes in behavior, lethargic behavior, and even the resurfacing of old, painful, seemingly forgotten memories from decades ago.

Lastly, it must be considered who Alzheimer's disease affects — the elderly. Seeing a small child ravaged with Leukemia will surely tug at your heartstrings. Seeing an old woman who can't remember her grandchild's name is completely different. There is a STIGMA in this country that makes the elderly seem less important than everyone else. It is a type of systematic violence that perpetuates the ideas that older people become useless and burdensome as they age. We feel justified in putting the elderly in nursing homes or passing them along to other family members, in an "out of sight, out of mind" way of thinking. However we cannot continue to allow Alzheimer's disease to go unnoticed. It is a disease worthy of our attention and deserving of funding for research.

This is exactly what makes the American Alzheimer's Association such a remarkable organization. People are working hard everyday to stop this terrible disease, but they can't do it alone. Fundraising drives, such as the memory walks, are a crucial part of the fight. As funding and education increase, the battle against Alzheimer's disease is becoming one that we can realistically win. In the mean time, do not shy away from loved ones with the disease. They are still human beings, with emotions and feelings. It may be frustrating talking with an Alzheimer's sufferer, but treating them like they don't exist only makes their lives harder ... and as I found out personally, you may be surprised at just how enlightening and rewarding of an experience it can be.

Supporting terror must stop

Anis Sarrage

Osama Bin-Laden is a man of peace. What is your reaction? I must be joking, right? Or maybe I'm stupid, crazy, or maybe I love terrorists. With that kind of statement, would I be fit to be the most powerful man alive, namely the president of the USA? Well guess what, our president said the same thing...actually worse, depending on how you look at it.

Michael Moore brought up many great points in his recent film, Fahrenheit 9/11. He didn't mention one crucial topic in that film, though. Maybe he forgot, or maybe he just didn't want to go there. You left me no choice, Michael, so I will go there.

America's love for Israel is no secret. Every time the rest of the world condemns Israeli actions and they are ordered to do something about it, we turn around and veto. Just to refresh your memories, the Israelis are building a wall over 400 miles long to keep the Palestinians out, putting serious limits on their water, their trees, and splitting up more of their land.

In July, the UN world court, consisting of 15 countries, voted 14-1 that the construction of the wall is completely illegal and suggested the wall tear it down. Who was the one country to vote against the other 14, you may ask? Why that would be us, the USA.

We said the world court is not the proper venue for this matter. I ask-what is? Let's not forget early September 2001. Not the one you're thinking of. I'm talking about the world conference on racism in Durban, South Africa, in which two countries dropped out of the conference. The Palestinian issue was brought up at that conference, and we decided to take Israel and ditch the conference.

Both these men are responsible for the death of nearly 3,000 people each. Why is it that Bin-Laden is the most wanted man alive, and Sharon is a man of peace?

Are we still the greatest country in the world? If so, how do you justify these actions? Soon after he took office, George Bush took a trip to Israel, in which Ariel Sharon took him for a little intimate helicopter ride. Immediately following that ride, Bush came on the news and said "Ariel Sharon is a man of peace." Maybe some of you don't know a lot about this Palestinian/Israeli issue. I am not an expert myself, but I know enough not to call a terrorist/murderer a man of peace. This past weekend marked the 22nd anniversary of the Sabra and Shatila refugee camp massacre. These were camps right outside of Beirut, Lebanon that were home to Palestinian refugees. Israel's defense minister at the time, none other than Ariel Sharon, sent in a right-wing Lebanese Militia to wipe out 3,000 men, women and children within 72 hours. As if that wasn't enough, Sharon thought it would be nice if he also sent in some Israeli troops for logistical support. The highest court in Israel found Sharon responsible for the atrocities as well.

On Sept. 11, 2001, Osama Bin-Laden had a similar idea-to wipe out as many Americans as possible, and he killed over 2,800 within a few hours. Both these men are responsible for the death of nearly 3,000 people each. Why is it that Bin-Laden is the most wanted man alive, and Sharon is a man of peace? Are Palestinian lives worth less that American lives? Or does our undying love for this terrorist state called Israel cover all that up? After all, they are the beneficiaries of over $3 billion a year in military support, or nearly $10 million a day. Iran and Syria are both lucky enough to be on our sanctions list. What did they have to do to earn such a spot?

Just train some 'terrorists' and give them support. Are these terrorists any different than Sharon and his gang? Actually, yes-these 'terrorists' fight within their borders to protect their country, and in their home countries are known as 'freedom fighters.' Maybe that's where that line comes from; One man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter.

In more recent news, our government will be supplying Israel with 5,000 smart bombs, costing $319 million of our tax money. America knows Israel is using our weapons in violation of AECA agreements between both countries. The AECA agreements stipulate that Israel must not use such weapons in civilian territories, yet Israel consistently uses these weapons in densely populated areas and the U.S. has never even reprimanded Israel for doing so.

All in all, Bush and his administration love terrorists as much as anyone else. Since they support and defend other terrorists, wouldn't that make them terrorists, similar to Iran and Syria?

These people should not be in charge of our country; once called the greatest country on earth. We have the right to speak against what they do, especially when it is of this magnitude. I don't even have to mention Afghanistan or Iraq, they should speak for themselves.

If we don't wake up now, we will soon suffer like all the others. If we want to be the greatest nation once more, we must let our voices come out, along with our actions.

We must remember those who died in the atrocities at Sabra and Shatila because our decisions reflect the fate of many lives.

'Candy Freak' a sweet treat

Author explains the ins and outs of the candy game

By Molly Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

Steve Almond's new novel is an ambitious attempt at unwrapping the candy business by touring candy factories nationwide, visiting with a bonilide 'candy historian,' and fellow candy aficionados; and (finally) penning a dazzling love letter to chocolate.

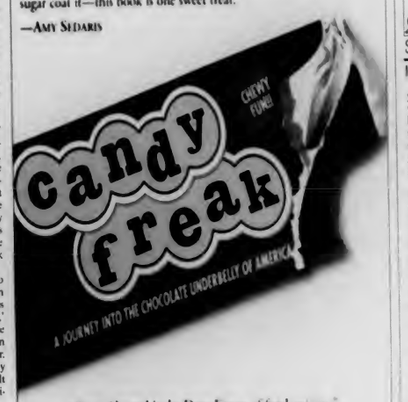
'Candy Freak' By Steve Almond Algonquin

'Candyfreak' is a deliciously well-written book, chock-full of perfectly chosen prose and droll slang, and sprinkled with delicately placed personal revelations. It's a good thing Almond's passion for candy is infectious, because, let's face it- it isn't easy to make a 260 page book on chocolate riveting.

But he succeeds — this man is a candy freak.

Almond immediately outlines several facts that point to his penchant for candy as pre-destined. Namely, both his father and grandfather's proclivity for sweets, his birthday (four days before Halloween), his syrupy sounding last name, and the fact that he grew up on a street named — I'm not kidding here —Wilkie Way.

Coincidence? Not to Almond. Indeed, all of these facts direct the reader to a man who always has between three and seven pounds of candy in his home at any given time, not to mention the twelve cases of Kit Kat Dark he has stashed in an undisclosed warehouse.



However, this book isn't just an exercise in reviewing different candies or describing the manufacture of obscure chocolate bars like the 'Twin Bing' and the 'Goo Goo Cluster,' although he does so with deceptively elegant prose; Nor is it a connoisseur's take on the history of chocolate bars in America, though Almond does do an excellent job outlining the rise of the three chocolate empires: Mars, Nestle and Hershey.

Instead, 'Candyfreak' takes you on a fantastic journey across the United States, touring factories in true Willy Wonka fashion, sampling Peanut Chews straight off the conveyor belt at the Goldenberg Candy Factory in Philadelphia, which is bizarrely situated across the street from a large pink prison.

It brings you back to Almond's early days as a teen in California, which he sums up with 'got high, ate candy,' and his mournful ode to the unfortunate discontinuation of his beloved Caravelle bar. Almond hints at his lonely childhood and the adult paranoia and fear that cultivate his candy habit today.

'Candyfreak' succeeds in stunning you with its engaging approach and surprising tenderness. And though his style has been compared to Dave Eggers and David Sedaris, Almond deserves his own accolades. Because I doubt either of the other two authors ever inspired a two-hour trip to the candy aisle at CVS.

"I got a real sugar rush and cluster headache reading this bittersweet book by Steve Almond-joy, the sugar daddy himself. I won't sugar coat it—this book is one sweet treat."
—Amy Sedaris

Growing up, one of my favorite people has been my grandfather for many reasons. One being that in a family of strong matriarch's who can only get their point across by yelling, my grandfather (whom we call Dickey), has always kept his cool, and made his point through calm rationale and reason. Another reason was that my grandfather smelled and looked good at all times.

As a tax lawyer for the state, Dickey was the only black lawyer for many years at his job. From a young child I remember him saying to me, "you have to dress for the job that you want, not the job you have," and if that was true, then my grandfather must have wanted to be the president of the United States — or Billy Dee Williams. He wore suits everyday to work, never just a shirt and tie, complete with suspenders and a feather fedora; and on the weekends, even when doing repairs on the house he would rise early, and put on his weekend uniform of khaki pants, a polo, and Sperry Boatshoes. My grandfather put an ideal in my mind about how a man should present himself, and it is an ideal that I still hold onto today.

My expectations of how a man should dress have changed just as often as how I should dress has changed. Clothes or the man?

the situation, and give me an honest answer void, of regards for my feelings — my girls. On the way to class the other day, I asked a friend of mine how she felt about dating a guy that cannot dress. "I couldn't do it," she immediately declared, "a guy doesn't have to be the best looking thing on the planet, but if he can dress, that means so much more to me," when I asked her why she thought about it a moment before she responded, "I'm not really sure, a man who can dress just looks so much more put together, and like he knows what he wants." I asked, "so it's a power thing?" She replied, "yeah I guess so." She then said, "who doesn't want a man who's in charge of things and knows where he's going?"

Is that what it really all comes down to? Power? Is that why I love a man who knows how to tie a tie, or wears suspenders with a suit? Is that why my grandmother, no matter how boisterous and intimidating she is to anyone who meets her, her tone declines two octaves when she speaks to my grandfather? Possibly. Just looking at some of my favorite celebrities tells a story about how much I appreciate a well-dressed man.

First off, there's P. Diddy — Undoubtedly one of the best-dressed men in entertainment. I can honestly say that I am not a fan of Diddy's music, but of his style? I am probably his number one fan. I love to watch award shows to see Mr. Diddy coming down the red carpet, outdressing all of his hip-hop counterparts.

At the 2004 MTV video Music Awards, I sat like a kid waiting for Christmas, for the Hollywood glitterati as they paraded down the red carpet, and when P. Diddy came, in the biggest yacht, and the best white Armani suit — my little heart was content. And It's not just P.Diddy: amongst my favorite dressed celebrities is Andre 3000. His look has truly brought back the dapper look of earlier times, complete with the Fedoras, and the suspenders. I spoke so fondly of earlier.

Finally, after many days of conflict with my question, I realized that for me it is deeper than just wanting a man who can dress. A well-dressed man has many implications in society. If a man knows how to dress, then that means he has one less thing to worry about, when it is time for him to enter society and the workforce. I am highly bothered by a man who can't tie a tie, or doesn't own a suit, to me it implies that he hasn't been exposed to a cetain level of professionalism, that people our age should be, so do clothes make the man? Possibly, but I'd rather he make them.

P. Diddy (left) and Andre 3000 are both prime examples of a girl's desire for a well-dressed man.

Artists perform on great wall

BEIJING (AP) Alicia Keys, Nellie McKay and Cyndi Lauper brought pop music to an ancient setting, performing for thousands of Chinese fans at the foot of the Great Wall.

Also on the bill of Saturday's concert was Boyz II Men and vocalist Sylvia Tosun.

Keys wore a leather jacket and a hat pulled low over her face as she performed eight songs on a stage beside one of the wall's immense gatehouses north of the Chinese capital.

"Thank you for having me at the Great Wall," she said as fans cheered. Organizers described the concert as the first by foreign musicians at the wall, although British disk jockey Paul Oakenfold performed there last year and later released an album of the show.

Some of the proceeds from Saturday's concert were to go to a Chinese children's charity, promoters said.

Despite the chilly autumn evening, Lauper performed part of her set barefoot. She descended from the stage and into the audience at one point, causing a brief flurry as Chinese police ordered spectators to sit down.

A children's choir joined Tosun as she sang a traditional Chinese song, "Jasmine."

New program changes face of med schools

Harvard students gain hands-on experience through experimental teaching methods

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Carolyn Casey's pager jolted her awake in wee hours of the morning: One of the Harvard medical student's patients had checked into the hospital and needed a Caesarean section. Casey rushed off, arriving just in time to help deliver her first baby.

Later, Casey visited the mother, Camila Santans, newborn Matthew and other family members in their room at The Cambridge Hospital, talking with them about breastfeeding and the gestational diabetes that had complicated the pregnancy. In the coming weeks, Casey will accompany Santans to follow-up appointments and checkups with Matthew's pediatrician.

It's all the kind of attentive, hands-on experience many assume is typical in a doctor's training. In fact, it's exceedingly rare.

At Harvard Medical School, as elsewhere, most students will see a dozen births or more during a three-week obstetrics rotation, but they rarely will meet a mother before she arrives at the hospital, or see her again once she leaves. On other rotations, they may see acutely ill cancer patients, but they may not be there to break the news, or follow them and their illnesses over a course of chemotherapy.

Casey and seven other third-year Harvard students are part of an experimental program that hopes to address those shortcomings by casting aside the traditional hospital rotation system. Rather than moving from specialty to specialty every few weeks for intensive blocks of training, they are following individual patients, wherever their conditions take them in the health care system.

Some patients are pregnant, others ill — either already diagnosed with complicated medical problems or picked up in the emergency room before anyone knows what is wrong.

If the patients have specialist appointments, the students accompany them, even sitting with them in the waiting room.

If they need surgery, students observe and assist. In some cases, they visit patients at home. And if patients die, as has already happened in the early months of the program, students will be there for that, too.

The hope is that these relationships will both help the students become more empathetic physicians, and make the science they are supposed to be learning stick in their minds.

'We remember experiences because they are meaningful to us,' Casey said.

The experiment is one of several around the country that concern clinical training, though Harvard's is 'unique in scope,' said Dr. Michael Whitcomb, senior vice president for medical education at the Association of American Medical Colleges.

The efforts are emblematic of a growing dissatisfaction among some medical educators with the clinical training that students receive in their third and fourth years of medical school, after two years in the classroom.

That discontent stems from significant changes at the teaching hospitals where clinical training takes place. Patients once spent weeks in teaching hospitals, and students could follow them from diagnosis through treatment. Now teaching hospitals, like other medical centers, shuffle patients quickly in and out, and students get little more than a snapshot.

Teachers involved in the Harvard program say typical medical students aren't getting the same human contact that instructors remember from their training days. Nor are students necessarily getting interdisciplinary views of illnesses, which don't always fit neatly into categories.

Perhaps most importantly, the teachers worry students aren't practicing the skills that, for all of the changes in medicine, are still supposed to be the focus of the third year: taking patient histories and thinking through a diagnosis.

In the past 'you had students involved in really core thinking that was going on to diagnose a patient, and you were with a patient long enough to see it actually happen,' said Dr. Barbara Ogur, one of two co-directors of the Harvard program. 'That was being totally lost.' The focus in teaching hospitals now is on stabilizing patients; often a diagnosis has already been made, or the patient is discharged before it is completed, she said.

Still, the prevailing rotation system has lasted for decades because it has its virtues: it exposes students to a range of cases, is relatively easy to organize, and offers hospitals a pool of free labor. In 2000, an Association of American Medical Colleges survey found that medical schools had responded to the explosion of new drugs, technologies and treatments with a substantial retooling of the classroom portions of their curricula, Whitcomb said. But the third and fourth years of medical school had been largely untouched.

Reform has been 'remarkable for its slowness,' said Dr. Kenneth Ludmerer, a historian of medical education at Washington University in St. Louis. Several similar attempts at changing clinical rotations during the 1950s failed, he said. Even as health care has become increasingly outpatient, 'it's been so convenient for hospitals to keep teaching in the hospital,' he said.

Dr. David Hirsh, Ogur's co-director, admits some colleagues have been skeptical about the new program, and even he isn't sure it could work on a broader basis.

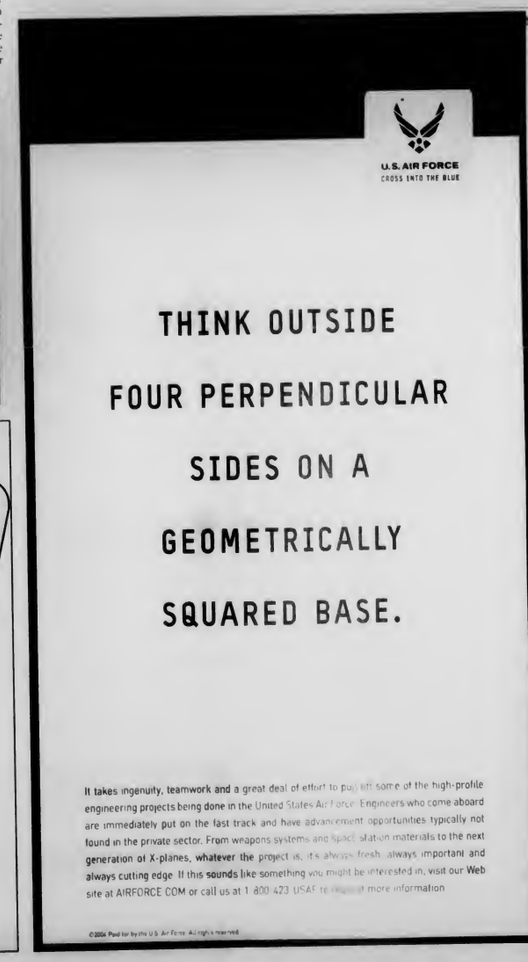
'My biggest concern is scaling up,' he said. 'It may be the best thing since peanut butter.

But the question is, is that because we're putting a tremendous amount of resources into only eight people?' The logistics have been tough, he said, as has been lining up the extra teaching the students need to cover material they might not otherwise see. And even if Harvard could make the system work for all 170 students in a class, that's no guarantee poorer or larger programs could do so.

Harvard medical students will have more interaction with patients by following their own patients

Hirsh says the key to success is picking patients who will expose the students to the widest range of experiences.

A typical example is Catalino Rodriguez, who on a recent afternoon visited student Joanna Epstein at the Windsor Street Health Center in Cambridge, an outpatient clinic. Rodriguez has a variety of complicated and considerably interconnected health issues: a leg injury from a workplace accident, heart problems, and most recently a dangerous infection that hospitalized him for five weeks. He also is in recovery from substance abuse.



Epstein first met Rodriguez during his hospital stay; he went to the Windsor Street Center with girlfriend and caretaker Patti Miller, who worried that a recent, small spike in his temperature could signal a recurrence of the infection. Epstein and Ogur, who joined the appointment later, concluded that it wasn't an immediate threat but told Rodriguez to watch his temperature carefully.

"When you're [illegible] seeing someone. She knows a friendly face, it makes a [illegible] a little more [illegible] Rodriguez said of Epstein. "She can speak up for you."

Miller said Epstein also helped her deal with the [illegible] of Rodriguez's hospital stay. "She's younger, she's more [illegible] age," she said. I thought it [illegible] for us to talk to her."

Epstein says the relationship has paid off for her [illegible]

"He's actually [illegible] Epstein says. I tell [illegible] Harvard professor at this point. He can add that to [illegible] resume."

Cross-country successful in NY

By Eric Atlas and Martha Powers
Collegian Correspondents

On Saturday the Massachusetts men's cross-country team earned first place in the Orange County Classic in Syracuse, New York. The meet came down to Syracuse and Massachusetts with the Minutemen pulling ahead for a victory 29-31.

"I was hopeful that we could beat Syracuse, but I was pleasantly surprised about the win," coach Ken O'Brien said. "Last year we were beaten convincingly by Syracuse, and we needed a good performance."

Finishing first for the Minutemen was Ryan Corbett followed by Nils Fischer, Matt Klyplia, Andy McCarron, Matt Clark, Paul Ncone, and Ryan Durkin.

"Corbett and Fischer were matched pretty well with the top Syracuse runners for the first three and a half miles. The last mile and a half they lost a little ground, but there was a very strong pack of UMass runners behind them that stayed together and gained ground," O'Brien said. "Our top six runners were in before Syracuse's fourth runner."

The meet took place on a golf course and proved to be a challenging run.

"Almost everyone performed at their maximum level, and it was enjoyable to see that at this stage of the season. Another reason we won today was because the runners who were on last year's team improved their times by 20 to 45 seconds," O'Brien said. "The newcomers were also a big part of our victory."

Freshman Nils Fischer, who finished fifth overall, has been a welcomed addition to the team.

"The most exciting thing about the race wasn't just that we won, but that we could have done so much better," Fischer said.

Ryan Durkin, also a freshman, improved his rank when he finished seventh for Massachusetts, up from 10th place last week.

"I felt pretty good the entire race. Sean Corbett was a big help to me because he would tell me to speed it up when I started to slow down," Durkin said. "College cross-country is so much more fun than high school. I'm having a great time."

In the women's meet, it was Syracuse University that took the win over Massachusetts at the Orange Cross Country Classic at Syracuse. Syracuse edged UMass 30-34 to won the invitational.

UMass freshman Christina Derosa took second place with a time of 19:53.14 and continues to be the key runner for the team. Derosa crossed the finish line behind another freshman, Liz Cutari (18:58.03) of Syracuse. Freshman Cuisle Kierans (20:15.16) placed fifth, and juniors Amanda Dahlberg (20:23.59) and Alexis Anzelone (20:32.79) placed seventh and eight for UMass. Freshman Kristen Ross (20:52.92) came in 12th place.

Overall, UMass placed second overall and had five runners in the top 12 to finish ahead of Siena, Niagara and Canisius.

of a victory since September 3, a 1-0 victory over Siena. They have tallied just six goals all season long led by sophomore Meredith Davis (two goals).

But are the Crusaders going to be overlooked? Don't kid yourself. Just like the Maroon and White, Holy Cross has been playing tough in 2004 with five of their six losses being decided by one just one goal.

"I look at it to be a really tough game," coach Jim Rudy said. "Right now they're 1-1[6], and if we treat them like a 1-[6] team, then we shall surely suffer the same fate as Central Connecticut."

It has been nearly three years since the Minutewomen have faced Holy Cross in an exhibition and almost 15 since they played an actual regular season game. But that doesn't make them a mystery.

From a distance, the Crusaders may look like a team lacking defense, letting opposing offenses squeeze into the area, but they are a defense that absorbs and minimizes room needed to create plays which worries Rudy.

"We're susceptible on counter-attacks. When we push a lot of people forward, they're susceptible because they're new and they don't have great speed," Rudy said. "Unless you're real clinical with your finishing in the box in a crowded penalty area, they're the type of team that just feeds off the breaks, and that's what scares me."

That defensive corps includes senior midfielder Danielle Carvalho. While she has yet to register a point on the stat sheet, she sticks out on the radar as a major threat for creating breaks.

"She's sort of a go-to-person for them, a real catalyst for them," Rudy said.

Midfielder Lindsey Pereira, a sophomore from nearby Ludlow, has notched one goal for two points through 2004. She is also the daughter of Freddy Pereira, one of the greatest soccer players ever to come out of western Massachusetts.

But the Minutewomen are practicing heavily on their shots, and the results began to show off against CCSU. UMass scored three goals in the first half, including the first of the season for both Fairweather and Blyler.

"That was really big for us," Blyler said. "We've been struggling on offense a lot, and it was really hurting us that we were playing defense the whole time. So I think that's definitely taken a lot of pressure off the defense, and it takes a lot of pressure off us, too, because we've been pretty frustrated lately with not being able to finish goals."

The coming around of Fairweather, Blyler and junior midfielder Lindsey Bellini has allowed the further development of the younger portion of the squad. Though freshmen Britt Canfield and Jenny Roehrig still lead the team in goals with two apiece, the Minutewomen attack is becoming more and more balanced with each game.

"I don't know if you can really judge a team by its record since we're 1-5, and I think we're pretty talented," Blyler said. "I think they're struggling, too, so we can capitalize on that. We just had our first win. Their first win was a few games back. We definitely have momentum going into this game."

age of 53.0 yards per kick.

The offensive stalemate continued into the second quarter when the Massachusetts defense had two rare breakdowns. Riccio, in his first year with Delaware after transferring from Missouri, accounted for more than half of his passing yards on two plays that highlighted the Delaware scoring drive.

Riccio completed a 37-yard pass to receiver Justin Long to the UMass 28-yard-line, and he hooked up with a wide-open Joe Bleymaier on a 26-yard touchdown pass two plays later.

The lead was short-lived, however, as the Minutemen had three third down conversions while putting together a 12-play, 76-yard scoring drive to answer the Delaware touchdown. Wide receiver Brandon London scored his first career touchdown when he caught a nine-yard pass from quarterback Tim Day, and the score was tied at seven.

UMass began its second drive of the second half at its own five-yard-line and moved the ball deep into Delaware territory before Haugabrook intercepted a pass at the Delaware 12-yard-line to keep the stalemate knotted at seven.

Haugabrook said he knew Peebler would be running an out-pattern because of the film study he did heading into the game.

"If Peebler goes in motion, they're going to run an out-route or an out-and-up route," Haugabrook said. "I saw the ball come, and I tried to go get it."

Delaware retook the lead in the fourth quarter when Riccio hit David Boler on third down for a 10-yard touchdown pass on a fade route to the back corner of the end zone.

The Massachusetts offense only ran six plays and couldn't gain a single first down for the rest of the game after Delaware took the lead. The Fightin' Blue Hens were able to put the game away after feeding UMass a steady diet of Sean Bleiler for the remainder of the fourth quarter.

The Blue Hens put together an 11-play, 57-yard touchdown drive that clinched the game and took the life out of UMass. They were able to eat up 5:54 off the clock as they converted on three third downs. Bleiler ran the ball 10 out of the 11 plays on that drive, including the final seven plays.

Bleiler ran for 46 yards on the drive, which he capped off with an eight-yard touchdown run with only 1:41 to play in the game.

Any thoughts of a UMass comeback were dismissed when linebacker L.A. Love fielded a short kickoff and fumbled the ball at the Massachusetts 33-yard-line.

Penalties once again hurt the Minutemen as well. They were penalized 11 times for 81 yards, with three of those flags coming because of substitution infractions. Keeler said that he prepared his squad to stay smart in that category.

"I told the guys that this is one of the most penalized teams in the country," Keeler said. "We need to play clean. We need to see if we can get some yardage that way."

UMass was led on defense by sophomore linebacker Charles Walker who tied a school record with 23 total tackles. Walker only had 24 tackles on the season entering the game.

Peebler, UMass' biggest offensive threat, has had a nagging hamstring injury that has slowed him over the past couple weeks. He only caught one ball for seven yards against Delaware.

"I don't know what Peebler's injury was, but whatever kept him off the field, I was glad about that," Keeler said.

The Minutemen will try to win their 500th all-time game for the third straight week on Saturday when they travel to Boston College to take on the Eagles at 1 p.m.

In the second half, the Huskies tacked on three insurance goals to their lead. Puddle earned an assist, setting up Lauren Henderson's 12th goal of the season. Henderson currently leads in the nation in scoring. The final two goals were both scored by Kari Cavanagh unassisted.

The Minutewomen created a few solid chances to score against UConn but were unable to make any of them materialize. In the first half, the Maroon and White had a penalty corner which resulted in two consecutive shots. Marije Tigchelaar took the first shot, which was saved by Bostwick. Nicole Phelan attempted to score on the rebound but miscalculated, and the shot was high.

Another scoring opportunity came for the Minutewomen with just over a minute left in the first half with a strong offensive charge on a penalty corner. The Maroon and White managed two shots in a row, but both Jaime Bawden's initial attempt and Tigchelaar's rebound shot were saved by Bostwick.

"We really need to be at a certain level when we come to play our conference games, and that's what these games are for," Massachusetts coach Patty Shea said. "We have to test ourselves out there. We failed some parts of the test today, but we just have to figure out those pieces of the puzzle."

Against Vermont, UMass scored the game-winner with 1:45 remaining in the first half. Bawden earned her first goal of the season off the penalty corner, and assists were credited to Tigchelaar and Katelyn Woolfrey.

"We had a lead going into the second half," Shea said. "But you need to play for success, not to protect a lead. Once you start playing to protect a lead, you are in serious trouble. The other team has nothing to lose, but we do."

Especially remarkable in yesterday's game were two defensive saves made in the second half by the Minutewomen. After a diving save from Tocco, the Catamount offense managed to get past her, but Tigchelaar pounced on the shot for a defensive save. Borneo also earned a defensive save later in the half, knocking the ball away after a scuffle in front of the cage.

UVM dominated the second half of the game with 18 shots and 12 penalty corners. Despite the concentrated offensive pressure from the Catamounts, they were unable to score against Tocco, who made 10 second half saves.

"In the second half, we became individuals. It wasn't a unit moving, and it became really random," Shea said.

At 14:28, Vermont nearly managed to tie the game. After Tocco made a diving stop, there was a rebound scramble in front of the net. Although the ball made its way into the cage, it bounced off a player's knee and was ruled no goal by the referee.

Towards the end of the game, UMass finally began to put offensive pressure on the Catamounts. With just under two minutes left to play, Caitlin Beresin scored an insurance goal for the Maroon and White. As a Vermont defender tipped the ball, Beresin managed to intercept it, snapping it past the goalie for the game's final score.

Hens force UMass to lay an egg

Minutemen lose their second straight game at McGuirk

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

For the second consecutive week, the Massachusetts football team was unable to muster much of an offense and dropped its second game in a row as a result.

Delaware	21
UMass	7

The defending NCAA Division I-AA National Champion Delaware Fightin' Blue Hens defeated UMass 21-7 in front of 11,298 at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday.

UMass scored 95 points in its first nine quarters of the season, but has been slow and inconsistent since then.

"We've only scored seven points in the last seven quarters," UMass coach Don Brown said. "We've got to go back to the drawing board and do a better job on that end in finishing drives. We've got to get some answers there."

Massachusetts receiver Brandon London hauls in his first career touchdown reception on Saturday. London caught 5 passes for 56 yards.

UMass quarterback Tim Day tries to elude the rush of Delaware freshman linebacker Marquez Davis. Davis tallied seven tackles and forced a fumble on Saturday while Day was 12-23 for 114 yards and a TD.

Leading the way for the Delaware 13-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) offense was junior quarterback Sonny Riccio, who was 11-of-18 for 115 yards and two touchdowns. Although his passing wasn't spectacular, his scrambling ability kept the UMass 12-2-0-2 A-10) defense off balance, as he ran for 70 yards on 17 carries.

Sean Bleiler and Lonnie Starks also anchored Delaware's running game. Bleiler, a bruising, power running back ran for 110 yards and a touchdown on 22 carries while Starks, a quicker back, ran the ball 12 times for 61 yards.

The disparity between Fightin' Blue Hens' big offensive line and the Massachusetts' undersized defensive line allowed Delaware to control the ball on the ground while rushing for 239 yards as a team.

The first quarter was a big battle for field position as the two teams failed to put any points up on the board. After UMass did not gain a first down on its first possession of the game, it appeared as though Delaware would begin its next drive with good field position after the Minutemen stalled their drive on their own 23-yard-line.

However Sophomore punter Christian Koegel boomed a punt over the head of Delaware;s Sidney Haugabrook, and the ball bounced around wildly before rolling out of bounds inside the Delaware one-yard-line. The 76-yard punt was the third longest punt in UMass history and the longest by a UMass punter since 1998.

Koegel was named Atlantic 10 Special Teams Player of the Week for his performance, as he punted six times on Saturday for an aver-

Delaware wins in the trenches

Leading 21-7 with less than a minute remaining in Saturday's win over Massachusetts, Delaware coach K.C. Keeler attempted to drive a stake through the Minuteman defense's collective heart.

Facing first-and-goal from the 1-yard line, Keeler called tailback Sean Bleiler's number rather than taking a knee and ending the game. It was a decision that did not go over well with UMass linebacker Serge Tikum, who came across the line cleanly and laid a vicious hit on Bleiler, stopping the 220-pounder dead in his tracks before driving him to the turf.

It was the kind of hit that Maroon and White fans have come to expect from Tikum, a junior captain who has garnered the reputation as one of the team's resident assassins. Yet what the play represented more than anything else was frustration — the kind of frustration that forms when the best lick you lay on your opponent comes after the outcome of the game has long-since been decided.

The UMass defense's front seven was exposed on Saturday. Billed by coach Don Brown as aggressive, risky and lightning-quick, the Minutemen were certainly all of these during what amounted to another ferocious battle with the defending National Champions. However in allowing the Fightin' Blue Hens to chalk up 239 yards rushing, it was the group's youth, inexperience and lack of size that essentially made the difference in another disappointing loss.

"Defensively, [Brown] is playing a lot of young guys and moving a lot of guys around," Keeler said. "They're a little light in the butt up front, and we felt that that is where we needed to attack. We love their secondary — it's the best secondary in the league — so we felt the best match up for us was to run the football."

And run the football they did. Through the first quarter, 16 of Delaware's 18 offensive plays were on the ground, and while they had yet to produce any points to show for it, the Hens were well on their way to wearing down UMass' senior-less defensive front with an offensive line that outweighed the Minutemen across the board.

"With all the new players [along the defensive front], and their lack of size, we felt like we could just continue to hammer away at them and never waver from that," Keeler said. "We've had some trouble establishing the run and getting a push up front, but against the pressure and the blitzes we knew we would get, we thought it would be our best course of action."

While shifty halfback Lonnie Starks (61 yards) and quarterback Sonny Riccio (70 yards) carried the football effectively in the first three quarters, the teams remained deadlocked until the fourth quarter. Yet after wide receiver David Boler hauled in a 10-yard touchdown pass from Riccio with 12:27 to play, Keeler and the Hens were finally rewarded for their persistence in sticking with their game plan.

With an offensive line that averages 300 pounds, including 6-foot-6, 330-pound right tackle Paul Thompson, Delaware effectively pounded away with Bleiler for 81 total yards in the final frame and, more importantly, ate up 11:37 of the final 15 minutes to keep UMass from battling back.

"Our youth up front on defense was [evident]," Brown said. "I thought that we really got tired towards the end, and that made a difference in the game.

"Obviously they came in with a game plan to take advantage of our lack of size and I thought we did a good job against it. But obviously when you're in a grinder like that you need to be able to stem the tide in the fourth quarter, and we weren't able to do that."

UMass running back Bryan Smith carries the ball through a swarm of Delaware defenders. Smith rushed five times for 18 yards.

After a busy weekend at Garber Field, the Massachusetts field hockey team emerged with a win and a loss to show for their efforts. On Saturday, the Minutewomen (2-7) fell 4-0 to No. 6 Connecticut (9-0), but defeated Vermont (1-9) yesterday afternoon 2-0.

UConn	4

Senior goalie Christine Tocco was especially occupied during this weekend's pair of non-conference games, with a total of 21 saves. Tocco had 10 saves during the UConn game, while managing 11 against UVM. Tocco's saves were extremely acrobatic, including one particularly dramatic diving save against the Huskies where she was sprawled out on the ground, just barely managing to stop the shot with her outstretched stick.

Tocco and the Massachusetts defense managed to keep the game close in the first period, only trailing 1-0 at the half. Despite Tocco's five first half saves, Laura Puddle managed to thread through the defensive line and score unassisted off a rebound. Puddle's goal turned out to be the game-winner due to Connecticut goalie Melissa Bostwick's sixth shutout of the season.

Now that the Massachusetts women's soccer team is seeing the results show up in the win column, there has been a change in attitude.

"Someone said it, I don't know who, but it feels like we've won the NCAA [tournament]," junior Adair Blyler said of finally pulling off the first win in 2004, a 3-2 downing of the tough-playing Central Connecticut State Blue Devils. "It was a great feeling. I think it was just really a big relief for all of us. It relieved some tension."

"We've been fighting so hard lately, and things hadn't been going so well for us," senior Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather said. "They haven't been going our way, so to finally be winning is a huge relief."

The Minutewomen (1-5) would love nothing more than to keep the momentum rolling as they embrace upon a live-game homestand today against the Holy Cross Crusaders (1-6). Losers of four straight, the Crusaders have not felt the thrill

SGA photo controversy continues for UMass Bustamante plans to remove students involved

Eddie Bustamante speaks to students in the Malcolm X Community Center last Sunday.

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano and President of the Student Government Association Eduardo Bustamante plan to remove the individuals pictured in the controversial photographs from office and further the investigation to press criminal charges. The nine students photographed last March drinking alcohol in front of a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard in the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy office could face a variety of criminal charges according to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano.

Members of the SGA and SCERA are the subjects of an ongoing investigation, that according to Gargano is, "well underway" with the aid of University lawyers.

"We are going to charge the students with everything," he said, "they [charges] will include the misuse of private property, underage drinking - we are going to look at who they bought the alcohol from, and there is an investigation of the symbol that reflects racism and hate."

Gargano recognizes that he has the authority to punish these individuals an array of measures; however, he has not chosen any one action to bring against them yet.

"I have the authority to remove these people from office," he said, "I could give them 500 hours of community service, have them conduct an open forum discussion; I have a variety of sanctions at my disposal, I'm not ruling out dismissal."

The Vice Chancellor stated that he is still waiting for more pictures to be reveled

He also mentioned that he is waiting for more pictures to be revealed and urging the person who found Student Coordinator Brian Roberts' website to come forward. The unknown subject allegedly copied the original website and posted it in a memo sent out by the ALANA caucus Saturday.

Gargano formally announced that he believes that it is ethically right for these subjects involved to call it upon themselves to resign.

"I think that it is appropriate for all students to consider resigning," he said, "no one so far has said that they're resigning."

Both the Vice Chancellor and President of Student Government Association Eduardo Bustamante said they hope this will bring a positive look to the upcoming Senate elections this Wednesday and Thursday.

"I hope this will have a positive effect and encourage students to run for office and get involved," Gargano said, "it's important that students ask questions and find out where the [candidates] stand on the real issues."

Gargano wants a debate style forum to aid students and candidates to get to know each other and the issues at stake and Bustamante wants this incident to result in more student voting.

"I expect to see a bigger students turnout than ever," Bustamante said, "it is crucial that we speak out and I really want to express that this is a big opportunity for the student body to step it up."

During their meeting last night, Bustamante and Gargano agreed that change is imminent on this community.

"I want to stress that this isn't about the alcohol, it is about the culture that related the images. We were talking about the change that has to happen on the culture of this campus," Bustamante said, "I want to stress that it is not the individual students but their behavior and that they felt that it was acceptable to act that way — they will definitely be removed."

Bustamante talked about a "New Era of the SGA" and that this is the end of an old one.

"I am questioning how to exercise my executive authority within SCERA," he said, "everything will be really concise — I am going to do everything to remove this from SGA."

Bustamante referred to not only the removal of the nine photographed but also the removal the potentially discriminatory culture on campus.

"Racism is a world-wide problem and it is not acceptable and no one should find it acceptable to joke about," he said eager to start a new environment on campus. "SGA started a new era when I got elected, and this is a call to us [the students] to step it up."

Bustamante plans to address the campus community today at a press conference at 4:30 p.m. in Dukes Room, where he will have a logistical strategy to remove the nine subjects.

Legally, he recognizes that he cannot force the resignation of potential senators running in this week's Senate elections, but he can request the removal of hired positions like Speaker and Associate Speaker.

According to a report in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian yesterday, the website than contained the pictures belonging to Brain Roberts was dismantled this past July; however according to Coordinating Council member Pavel Payano, the website was still running last week.

"If I had only known about this in July," Payano said. "It's not like we've been planning it."

According to Payano, Roberts' website crashed sometime between Friday evening and early Saturday morning after the SCERA Student Coordinator was made aware that the pictures had been circulating.

SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins who was photographed several times and represented in the controversial told The Daily Collegian Sunday that the site had been taken down in July and that someone must have been in possession of the pictures since then.

Neither Higgins nor Roberts have been available for clarification.

Charges Against Certain Members of SGA:

1. Underage drinking
2. Misuse of Campus property
3. Providing Alcohol to a Minor
4. Potential acts of hate crimes

Many University of Massachusetts students learned for the first time yesterday that nine members of the Student Government Association and the Student Center for Education Research Advocacy were photographed drinking alcohol in a University office and posing by a drawing depicting the SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins as the Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan.

"It's so sad for our school," said Naomi Rudar, a senior. "To show such disrespect for students and express it so hatefully — it's disgusting."

Some students said they felt that the student leaders should not necessarily be expelled, but removed from their positions in the SGA.

"They shouldn't be around to run for another office," said junior Jason Andujar.

Andujar said he wouldn't want the students to be expelled, but they should recognize the toll their actions are taking on the student body.

"I think [Higgins] should resign," he said.

Freshman Chris Langseth said he first saw the photographs on one of several links to an Internet Web site where they were posted by an unidentified American Latino African Native American [ALANA] group supporter. Langseth said he was first struck by the caricature of Higgins portraying KKK imagery.

"The KKK is the most bothering," he said. "I don't want a white-only supporting Student Government."

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano says the students involved in the photos may face criminal charges for underage drinking on University property, however, some students said the fact that drinking occurred

Bangs Community Center provides unique ways to volunteer

Leah Hanin, left, and Jillian Grover are the supervisor and assistant supervisor of the Fun Club.

By Dan Tebe
Collegian Correspondent

Besides the usual Antonio's Pizza and college bar scene, there is another destination in downtown Amherst for University of Massachusetts students on Wednesday evenings.

The Fun Club in the Bangs Community Center on Boltwood Walk provides volunteers with the unique opportunity to interact with mentally and physically disabled members of the local community through activities such as decorating cookies and playing bingo. The Fun Club is a program coordinated by the Boltwood Project of UMass and Amherst Leisure Services.

The Bangs Center provides volunteers with a comfortable, easy-going atmosphere. "I love it," said Chad Cabaniol, a junior who works for Amherst Leisure Services. "Everything is so simple ... this is a great chance for different kinds of people to get together and not feel uncomfortable."

After the group and volunteers finish a project, every accomplished piece is presented to the rest of the group so that all the participants and volunteers get to know each other.

However, this process can seem more like a formality than a necessity, because everyone already acts as if they are with old friends. Jillian Grover, a fourth-year English major, is the assistant supervisor of the group. This is her second semester working with the Fun Club, and she says that she returned because she wanted to continue a friendship that developed with a member of the group last year.

Other Fun Club activities include dancing, talent shows, movie nights, and assorted outings in the area. Leah Hanin, a fourth-year political science major, is a member of another Boltwood group that volunteered at Northampton Pediatrics last year.

Hanin is the supervisor of the Fun Club for this semester. She says the club is a great way "to kill time," but she says she will always participate in community service no matter how busy she is.

Besides the Fun Club and the three Boltwood groups that volunteer at Northampton Pediatrics, there are many other groups run by the Boltwood Project. At Jessie's House — a center for displaced families in Amherst — volunteers can spend one-on-one time with adults in different homes in the area. The volunteers and disabled participants go to UMass Hockey games and take trips to the Hampshire Mall in Hadley.

"It is a[great stress relief — an outlet by doing something good for others and helping improve yourself," said Hanin.

At the end of a group outing night, it is not uncommon to hear the participants asking to be walked to the door by the volunteers, wishing to spend a bit more time with their newly made friends.

The Boltwood Project was created 33 years ago by Professor Emeritus Merle Willmann, who was a professor of recreational management and design at the time.

Education Abroad Fair highlights studying and working around world

By Erin Corcoran
Collegian Correspondent

Students, organizers, and vendors alike flocked to the Education Abroad Fair yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center.

At the fair, students with eager expressions could be seen all around.

Freshmen Nick Straggas and Amanda MacDonald expressed hopes to go the University of London for the entirety of their sophomore.

"I want to take it all in," said Straggas. "I want to experience the culture," said MacDonald.

Older students who have already experienced the travel abroad programs were present at the fair to express how wonderful it is to go. Several said that they wished they had stayed longer.

Senior Chanel Hooper said her travel abroad program took her to Oviedo, Spain for a semester. Hooper says she was scared, but went "with an open mind" and had the time of her life.

Chancel said it was such an influential experience, that Chanel changed her undeclared/communications major to Spanish.

Hooper says the most important point of traveling abroad is "location, location."

"Research on your programs...go for as much as you think you can handle," she said.

Chanel's said her most remarkable semester in Spain has inspired her to finish her classes in Argentina, were she hopes to work as an au pair. "Go abroad for long as your parents are willing to pay for," she said.

Senior Amy Pires visited Sienna, Italy for a year and said she loved every moment. She is currently a legal studies major with a minor in Italian. By living in Italy, she was able to strengthen the three semesters of Italian she has taken at UMass. Amy says that an experience abroad "is amazing [and] opens many doors."

Emir Borogovac, a native of Bosnia, has lived in the US on and off for six years. He says he has already done what so many students want to do—experience other cultures.

However, Borogovac says his

Voting to be held for Senate tomorrow

The Student Government senate elections will be held this Wednesday, September 29, and Thursday, September 30, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m.

Polling stations are located in all of the Dining Commons on campus and in the Campus Center. Residents from each living area are assigned to vote in a specific Dining Common.

—Residents of Northeast and Sylvan are expected to vote in the Worcester DC.

Residents of Orchard Hill and Central are expected to vote in the Franklin DC.

—Residents of Southwest are expected to vote in the Hampshire and Berkshire DCs.

Commuters are expected to vote in the Campus Center.

In the cases where they are needed, absentee ballots will be provided at the polls. The Vice Chancellor's office will provide some staff assistance to ensure that all polling locations will be open and available to the student body.

The program began with a few students visiting the Belchertown State School —an institution for the mentally and physically disabled — to assist the staff.

Willmann was told about the idea by a graduate student while at a coffee house on Boltwood Walk — hence the name of the project. For the past 20 years, the Boltwood Project has been student-run with minimal faculty control.

Becoming a member of the Boltwood Project is not difficult, but requires a short application process. Students who are selected participate in their group's two-hour meeting once a week. Students can earn one to two credits for participating, depending on their chosen level of involvement.

Enrollment for the fall semester has closed but The Boltwood Project is always looking for more people to join. If you are interested in participating this spring, you can contact The Boltwood Project at (413) 545-6753.

Prosecutors won't pursue rape charges against Dupre

Bishop Thomas Dupre

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Just hours after an indictment against former Springfield Bishop Thomas Dupre was unsealed Monday charging him of molesting two boys in the 1970s, the county prosecutor refused to pursue the case because the statute of limitations had expired.

"I felt I took it as far as I could. We've done everything we could do," Hampden District Attorney William Bennett said.

In the grand jury's indictment, Dupre was charged with molesting two boys in the 1970s becoming the first Roman Catholic prelate to face criminal charges in the sex abuse scandal in the American church.

However, the grand jury returned indictments only related directly to child abuse, and not to other possible charges, such as witness tampering and obstruction of justice. Without indictments on those charges, Bennett said he was precluded from pursuing the case because the statute of limitations in force at the time of the alleged crimes was limited to six years.

Still, Dupre's legal troubles are far from over. He still faces lawsuits filed against him by his accusers — and Bennett said he plans to turn over the results of the grand jury investigation to authorities in New Hampshire, New York and Canada, where some of the abuse allegedly took place. Bennett said those jurisdictions may not be hamstrung by the same statute of limitation issues.

"They could then make their judgment as to what, if anything, they deem appropriate," Bennett said.

Dupre, 70, cited health reasons when he resigned in February after nine years as head of the Springfield Diocese. But his departure came one day after The Republican newspaper of Springfield confronted him with allegations that he abused two boys while he was a parish priest. According to the indictment, Dupre started raping one of the boys in 1976; he started abusing the other boy in 1979.

Dupre's alleged victims, who filed lawsuits against the bishop, have said the abuse continued for years and that Dupre asked them to keep quiet about it when he was made auxiliary bishop in 1990. Bennett said the investigation uncovered no evidence to suggest there were any other victims, nor was there evidence that any church officials were aware of the allegations until they became public earlier this year.

He also said that there was no evidence Dupre destroyed or concealed any evidence of sexual misconduct by other church officials. Dupre's lawyer, Michael Jennings, said Bennett was doing the right thing by choosing not to prosecute the case.

"It was the grand jury that brought these charges, not the district attorney," he said. "Grand juries are very often used to investigate. He had announced that there would be different avenues pursued, cover-ups. He has concluded that these allegations of wrongdoing cannot be prosecuted."

But Jeffrey Newman, an attorney for the alleged victims, said the indictment showed that there is credible evidence against Dupre.

in the SCERA office did not bother them.

"I don't care that they were drinking," said Langseth.

Reactions from UMass alum on the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Web site voiced mostly disappointment at the misuse of power and resources within the student government.

"The resources of SCERA are a powerful tool to help shape public higher education policy," wrote former student coordinator of SCERA and UMass alum Jason Vecchio-Smith. "Use the power or lose the power!"

However, senior Jen Clark wrote that she felt that the photographs had been blown out of proportion and that more attention needs to be focused on the individuals who posted the pictures on the Internet, which appeared days before the scheduled SGA senate elections this Wednsday and Thursday.

"I am deeply saddened to see individuals within the ALANA office throwing the racism word at anyone who opposes or questions their actions," said Clark. While the drinking and whiteboard drawing was not excusable, Clark wrote that she felt "this intentional ploy by members in the SGA and ALANA office is being blown out of proportion."

Andujar said he was mostly shocked at the irresponsibility of the student leaders.

"He [Higgins] should have been more careful of his actions — especially in front of a camera," he said.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Reform needed for Student Government

The current plight that the Student Government Association finds itself in has no clear solution or easy fix. The photos that have emerged raise serious questions about the character and integrity of certain elected officials of the SGA. What is clear is this: strong leadership will be needed in the coming weeks to see the SGA through these times of trouble.

For the past two semesters, the SGA has been plagued with one problem after another. As a result, the reputation and legitimacy of the SGA has been called into question. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano has personally doubted whether the SGA is able to fulfill its mission of representing the students of this campus. It may be that the administration is considering serious changes to the way the SGA operates or reducing the authority it holds. In the past the administration has even taken the drastic measure of disbanding the SGA.

The timing of this latest controversy could not have been worse. The SGA is preparing to hold its Senate elections this Wednesday and Thursday. The process to establish proper procedures for the elections has been a long and difficult task. Now that effort is undermined by the current controversy.

The officials pictured in the now controversial photos should do what is best for the SGA and student body, and that is to resign. The only way the SGA can reclaim its legitimacy is to rid itself of those responsible for tarnishing its reputation. It is impossible for the body to effectively govern with those officials remaining in positions of power.

Resignations will not be enough, however. The SGA faces a difficult task of restoring the trust of the students. Strong leadership will be needed in order to steer the SGA back to its founding principles. If there is to be a future of the SGA, the importance of character in the candidates running for the senate seats is to be set at the highest priority. With the extreme significance of the upcoming SGA elections, it is vital that the student body take great pains to adequately research and select a candidate who will sufficiently uphold the values of this university.

Around halls in the dormitories and the DCs, there are flyers posted up all over announcing the candidates for the senate seats. However, not much is known about them beyond what can be typed on a flyer. And, on a campus this large and with a full course load, it can be very difficult for the candidates themselves to find the time to adequately introduce themselves to the general public.

Unfortunately, it is too late for this upcoming election, but one useful idea for future elections would be to hold a formal debate. This would help the student body, as well as members of the faculty, to form their own opinions of each of the candidates based on the information presented. Much like the presidential elections, this seems like a successful way to educate the student body and to let them know and feel comfortable with the people that will be speaking on their behalf. This will also allow us to more accurately judge for ourselves the character and integrity of the candidates.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

AN APOLOGY TO THE STUDENT BODY

Six months ago, following the conclusion of the Student Government Presidential Election, a group of students who spent countless hours working on my campaign gathered together to reflect on the semester. The semester had seen numerous emails and propaganda released claiming I was a bigot. After working for students for almost three years, my friends and the people I have encountered from various walks of life know this to be false. That evening I used poor judgment in choosing the SCERA office as a place to gather and showed insensitivity that I apologize for today.

During the course of the evening, one of the people in the room decided to depict me as a member of the KKK. Students, administrators and friends were bombarded last semester with false attacks against my character and this was a way for us to vent the frustration that accompanied these claims. The people in that room knew the hard work all of us had put in to improving the lives of all students, and this drawing represented a response to the inaccuracy of a semester's worth of attacks. A member of the group took pictures and posted them on his personal website feeling that people would understand the context of the evening and the drawing. I realize this to be naive and as I reflected on the evening and the picture, I realize how many in our community could be hurt by these photos.

It is my greatest honor to represent the Undergraduate Student Senate and be a member of this fine university. I have spent my last three years working to improve the lives of all students on this campus and lay the groundwork for an even better UMass for future generations of students. I recognize how this has made many in our community feel, and I will be working from this moment forward to begin to heal these wounds. I hope that this serves as an opportunity for us all to see how insensitive actions can affect so many people. This is a lesson I have learned first hand.

After the Presidential Election of the spring, I knew many people felt alienated by the SGA. This year, I recognized the appointed caucus senators on the Coordinating Council as an act of good faith and hopefully as a way to build a more united student body. I recognize that the pictures being circulated represent a setback to our goals of building a community where every student can feel at home, but I am confident that as a university we will only grow stronger in our quest for this ideal. Over the course of this week, I will personally be meeting with the various groups on campus to discuss this unfortunate evening. We have much work to do to heal these wounds, build a stronger community and move forward. I will be doing my best to aid this process.

Once again, I extend a heart-felt apology for the poor choices I made and the insensitivity that was shown, and I ask for your forgiveness as a community.

Pat Higgins
Speaker of the Senate

Haiti in need of help

Yousef Munayyer

The recent hurricanes that have battered the southern parts of this country and devastated the Caribbean have caused significant damage totaling in the billions of dollars. Houses were blown to pieces, cars were left under water and people watched as everything they owned was submerged and destroyed. However, these people can still be considered fortunate.

Imagine that the house you're living in is held together by mud. The walls of the structure in which you live comprise old oil cans held together by dried up dirt. This type of structure stands no chance in a vicious storm.

This past week, mass graves were being prepared for the victims of hurricane Jeanne in Haiti. The tiny, impoverished nation, which shares the island of Hispaniola with the Dominican Republic, is the poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere and most certainly among the three poorest nations in the world. The shantytowns, which are found all across the island nation, stood no chance against this hurricane. The port cities were especially affected.

I recall when I heard the first reports of a death toll last week. The headline mentioned that at least 300 had died because of the hurricane. I was shocked. However, it was not because the number was high, but because the number was low. Something told me that the death toll would continue to climb. As the hours, and then days, went by, I watched the reports come in; 550 dead, 700 dead, 1000 dead. Many more were lost. Finally, they had no choice but to wait until the waters had receded. There was no way to tell. There was only fear and hope, and many families were tragically disappointed.

In Haiti, millions practice or believe in some form of voodoo. If a body is not properly buried with traditional rituals it is believed that there soul will not rest in peace. However, for many souls, a proper burial is not going to happen. Bodies have been placed in mass graves and identification is very difficult. More bodies are uncovered in groups washed up toward slightly higher ground.

No nation in the Western Hemisphere deserves more of our attention than Haiti, and no nation receives so little.

The most tragic of all of this though is the inequality that is on display. When the hurricane will reach here, it will not do nearly as much damage. Many Floridians will board up their windows and some may even plan an evening indoors with flashlights and Yahtzee. The ones that are evacuating will drive their sport utility vehicles up a paved, three-lane highway. Many of them would probably not be able to locate Haiti on a map. However, many Haitians can find the United States; many of them dream of it.

Haiti's relationship with the Western world has been rough. At one point in the past 300 years, Haiti was one of the richest colonies in the French empire. Today, after centuries of plunder from both external invaders and internal corruption, Haiti is in a dismal state. No nation in the Western Hemisphere deserves more of our attention than Haiti, and no nation receives so little.

In 1804, Haiti became the first independent nation in the Western Hemisphere to ban slavery. It struggled for liberation from the French and now struggles to be liberated from underdevelopment. Still, this feat seems beyond Herculean as tragedy after tragedy punishes the island. Political corruption also plays a roll, as Haiti has only just begun to recover from decades of absolute fear under the Duvalier's. Political instability continues as Haiti made headlines last spring as a rebellion in Gonaives spread through the country and resulted in the exile of former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. Clearly this underdevelopment has accumulated over the years.

Now not only does Haiti have to clean up politically, but it also has to reconstruct the nearly non-existent infrastructure it had. With very few resources, few exports and consistent instability, investing in Haiti is similar to investing in Enron today, if not worse.

When a boat full of Cubans arrives in Florida, they are welcomed and given political asylum because they come from a place that our government deems as repressive. History shows us, however, that next to the Duvalier's, Castro looks like a Care Bear. The economic situation, if it can even be called that, is so bad in Haiti that its makes Cuba look like El Dorado. Yet when a boat full of darker-skinned Haitians arrives, we are not so welcoming. Our policy towards Haiti has to change. We must think about actual facts on the ground and history before determining how much help they need. Ideological considerations cannot be the only factor.

Haiti needs help and a lot of it. They don't need guns. They don't need an occupation. They need a lot of monetary assistance, loan guarantees and help getting back on their feet. We, as the richest nation on earth, can fill that role. There may not be oil in Haiti, nor is there any benefit from helping them whatsoever. However, if every nation is going to wait to find a clear interest or profit in helping Haiti, you have to wonder if it's ever going to happen at all.

Dorms not ideal for freshmen

Zach Oelschlegel

I'll be honest. Coming into this school as a freshman sucked. Being from Philadelphia, I knew absolutely no one at this school and had been in Massachusetts a total of four times in my life, two of those times before I turned ten.

Living in Sylvan didn't help the situation, either. As I stumbled into Brown and saw the outrageously small room that qualified as a double, then the single bar in the corner that was to serve as our "closet," I felt like doing the wimpy thing and crying. I had moved into the smallest room on campus, not knowing one person, and had to find someone to sit with for freshman convocation at the Mullins Center.

The only thing I gave one crap about those first few days was making friends. I already knew how bad my schedule stunk, but I didn't dread going to class. The only thing I was looking for were for a few pals. And while most of us come in thinking that out of the 24,000 students who go here, we'll find someone to hang out with by default, it couldn't be harder to make friends because the UMass housing system is a complete embarrassment.

Later that week, as I started to meet people on the floor, I realized that a lot of these people weren't even close to my age. Apparently the guy who lived across the hall was in his thirties, and the majority of the hall were transfer students, upperclassmen who wanted to get a single and freshmen.

UMass would do itself a huge favor by implementing a new plan as soon as possible, similar to the one Michael Gargano is proposing. By changing the system, the school would simultaneously be addressing some of the university's chief problems in one shot.

I had two upperclassmen in my suite and I think, throughout the year, I could count using my toes the amount of words each of them said to me. Juniors and seniors already have a set of friends and don't really need to find more, since they already have it made in a sense. I think the biggest tip-off describing my experience with these guys is that I haven't talked to them since my freshman year ended, and frankly, I have trouble recalling their names. It's no mistake that the only people that I still talk to from that suite were freshmen, since each of us had "making friends" a high priority on our to-do lists.

Judging that stories like mine aren't all that uncommon, with freshmen and seniors and twenty-eight-year-olds living on the same floor, the whole system clearly needs an overhaul. UMass would do itself a huge favor by implementing a new plan as soon as possible, similar to the one Michael Gargano is proposing. By changing the system, the school would simultaneously be addressing some of the university's chief problems in one shot.

The administration took a step in the right direction this year when they made the Pierpont and Moore dorms in Southwest all-freshman dorms to go along with Butterfield in Central. My question is, why did it take so long, and why aren't there five of six more dorms like Pierpont and Moore?

The best advantage to having more freshman dorms is that they build community, undeniably the best facelift this school could get. Since Massachusetts is so small, students can essentially go home at will if they have a car, and we all know how difficult it is to get to know people if they aren't in the vicinity. Every time a student leaves to go home to meet up with that safety net of high school friends, the university hurts a little. Having freshman housing would increase the amount of friends each student has on campus, meaning it would be less likely that a student go home whenever he or she can. Isn't one of the biggest goals of college to have lifelong friendships?

The other big upside to having all-freshmen dorms is that upperclassmen would be given dorms better suited to address their needs, since the dorm wouldn't really be as much of a melting pot of graduating classes. Housing programs would be geared more to preparing students for graduation than toward social events designed for first-year students. There would be fewer RAs monitoring the halls, since older students tend to police themselves a bit more and also have that maturity factor going for them. Every student would have a housing experience that fits his or her needs rather than meeting the needs of only a few people on the floor.

The stance that many in the UMass administration have taken is that living with upperclassmen is good for freshmen, because those older students will keep them in line, befriend them and give them tips on how to make it on this campus. Being reminded of my freshman year and seeing the experiences of freshmen on my floor today, I know how ridiculous that idea is.

I really am jealous of these Pierpont and Moore freshmen, because they are getting something the other four thousand freshmen are missing out on. Not only do they get to live in the hub of Southwest freshman year, but they also will leave UMass with a lot of lifelong friendships that others won't see. The administration finally took the hint this year with those two dorms, and they would be wise to keep the changes coming.

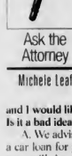
Since his directorial debut in the 1964 film "Hag in a Black Leather Jacket," John Waters has become legendary for his peculiar and often times disgusting humor. Though he has strayed from the legendary Waters' effects in his last group of films, his recent release, "A Dirty Shame," shows a return to the revolting discourse that has marked Waters as both one of the most deplored and celebrated independent filmmakers of all time.



Today's comedies have ushered in such aggressive topics as pubic hair on a wedding cake ("American Wedding") and men drinking a cup of feces and referring to it as nutty ("Austin Powers 2: The Spy Who Shagged Me"), yet still, many of the films that John Waters created in the '70s and '80s make these films look like as if they were made by Disney.

In a surprising change of paths, though, Waters' last two films, "Cecil B. Demented," and "Pecker," have been somewhat mild. This is not to say that either film was a failure in any sense, but what can be said is that both films seem to lack the bit of Waters punch like the days when Waters had the 400-pound transvestite Divine eat excrement in his film as she reened the mantra, "Filth is my politics."

The movie stars Tracey Ullman, of "Tracey Takes On" fame as Sylvia Stickles, the sex-free housewife of Vaughn Stickles (Chris Isaak). One day while Sylvia is driving through a suburban Baltimore neighborhood, she gets stuck in traffic. As she sits in the car, wallowing in her anger, her head is struck by something hanging out of a truck driving by. The blow lands her unconscious and when she awakens, a truck driver named Ray-Ray (Johnny Knoxville) is standing above her. Ray-Ray tells Stickles about how the accident has transformed her into a sex

Q. My friend has bad credit and asked me to co-sign a car loan for him. I know my friend needs a car to get to work and that he needs the job so that he can stay in school. I have excellent credit and I would like to help my friend. Is it a bad idea to co-sign the loan?

A. We advise you not to co-sign a car loan for your friend, because you will be putting both your friendship and good credit at risk. If your friend fails to make payments, you will be legally responsible and might well end up owing more than the car is worth.

A car loan is a specific type of contractual agreement where the lender or creditor has agreed to provide money to the borrower. When someone wants to take out a loan, they must qualify for it by having sufficient credit to provide for repayment of the loan. The lender wants to be reasonably sure of being paid back before agreeing to a loan. One way the lender can be reasonably assured is to require that the car be provided as collateral for the debt. That way, if the borrower does not pay, the lender can take possession of the car and sell it to satisfy the debt. When a loan is not repaid as specified in the contract, the borrower is considered to be in default, and the entire balance of the loan becomes due immediately, instead of in monthly payments. I

In addition, the creditor has the right to repossess the car after taking certain steps. The creditor is not required to give advance notice of the repossession and generally will not do so. Once a creditor has repossessed the car the creditor can keep it for compensation and, can do with it what he or she likes. Since they typically sell the cars at auction, the amount of the sale is usually for a price far beneath the retail fair market value and the amount still owed on the loan. In any case where the sale price is less than the loan amount the creditor can sue the borrower for the remaining balance, including all costs associated with the repossession and sale. Of course, in a situation where the borrower has been unable to make the monthly payments and has already lost the car to repossession, the creditor has little likelihood of actually collecting the money from that borrower.

This is why you are being asked to be a co-signer of the loan. The creditor has decided your friend is a poor credit risk and fears that even with the car as collateral the loan might not be paid off. By agreeing to approve the loan only if somebody else with good credit is made fully responsible for the debt, the creditor is signaling that the risk is significant that the borrower will have problems meeting the loan obligation. A co-signor can be held equally responsible for the debt, even though they have no use of the car.

Federal law requires that prospective co-signers be given a written notice before they co-sign a loan, making sure that the co-signer understands the legal obligations. You should carefully heed this notice. You may have to pay up to the full amount of the debt if the borrower defaults. It is important to understand that your liability includes all late fees and collection costs, including the cost of repossessing the car. There is no requirement that the creditor take legal action against the borrower before trying to collect from the co-signer. What's more, even if you do make payment, the fact that the loan was ever in default could end up as a negative mark on your credit report, for up to seven years.

If you still desire to help your friend, there are other options to consider that would limit your risk. You could loan your friend money for a larger down payment, which might make your friend eligible for a loan without a co-signer. If you still decide to go ahead with co-signing, you might lose your money . If despite this advice you still want to co-sign, you should try to negotiate with the lender to limit your liability. You can ask the lender to establish the maximum amount of money that you might owe in case of default. The lender does not have to do this, but some will if asked. For example, you may agree to pay the principal balance on the loan, but not be held responsible for late charges, court costs, or attorney's fees.

If you can reach such an agreement with the lender be sure it is in writing. Another thing you can do is to ask the lender to agree, in writing, to notify you if the borrower misses a payment. Notification should come before a late charge is added, or before the loan is "accelerated" [when the whole loan must be repaid at once]. This way you will have time to deal with the problem or make back monthly payments without having to repay the whole amount or risking the additional cost and consequences of repossession.

Wright movie sure to join cult classics

Day in and day out, as we wander about doing our daily routines, we are nothing but zombies. We shuffle along, lost in our own private universes, single-mindedly set on our own goals, oblivious to the world that surrounds us. That's the wry joke that propels "Shaun of the Dead," a cheeky, daft British zombie comedy that satirizes that venerable staple of the horror genre while simultaneously honoring its mutated pedigree.

The movie isn't a puerile spoof of the genre a la the "Scary Movie" films, but a film that seriously combines elements of horror and humor. This is not always a successful hybrid that, at it's best, has given us films like "An American Werewolf in London" and "Tremors." On the opposite side of the coin we often get uneven junkers like "Club Dread" and "Leprechaun."

"Shaun of the Dead" references everything from Lucio Fulci (hardened and sharp-eyed horror buffs will have to look for the joke) to "28 Days Later" to, naturally, the oeuvre of zombie godfather George A. Romero. The film is often brilliantly funny in that traditionally deadpan British way, but the gore quotient is still high enough to satisfy fans with a bit of a bloodlust.

The tagline for "Shaun of the Dead" calls the film "a romantic comedy with zombies," and the filmmakers have christened it a "rom zom com," (a romantic zombie comedy) which goes to show you the direction in which they skew it. And that direction is towards the daffy, motley crew of characters rather than the groaning undead who populate the streets of London after God knows what happened to revive the recently deceased. Since zombies are pretty much alike, writers Simon Pegg and Edgar Wright (Wright directs; Pegg gets to handle leading man duties) wisely have chosen to focus there attentions on the humans fighting against the cannibal horde pawing at windows for the fresh meat within.

Shaun (Pegg) is a 29-year-old slacker stuck in a dead-end life. His girlfriend of three years, Liz (Kate Ashfield), has dumped him thanks to the encouragement of friends who recognize Shaun's lack of ambition and inability to arrange anything nice for their anniversary. He doesn't get any respect at his job as the senior clerk at an electronics store. He hates his stepdad (Bill Nighy.) And he's constantly stuck in a battle of wills between his roommates, one of whom is his slothful, greasy and utterly indolent best friend Ed (Nick Frost.)

Shaun is so wrapped up in his staggeringly ordinary life as an overgrown kid that he fails to notice what's happening around him. Heading over to the market across the street to get breakfast in order to nurse his hangover, Shaun doesn't even notice that the neighborhood has gone to hell in a handbasket, with the first of many ghouls waddling down the street. The hyperventilating news reports are nothing but white noise for the videogame-loving duo of Ed and Shaun. It's only when a pair of zombies, whom they fend off with vinyl records, confronts them both in the garden, that the friends realize what's really wrong.

It's off to mum's house for Shaun, who, for once in his life, becomes proactive. His plan is to gather up friends and family and head over to the Winchester, the local pub with an antique rifle over the bar. After all, it's familiar territory to the chronic social-drinker Shaun.

"Shaun of the Dead" plays like a very-well written sitcom. Shaun is the gape-jawed loser suffering indignities at the hands of friends and family. He's got the dithering parental figure this mother, played by Penelope Wilton), the exasperated girlfriend and the doughnut-do-well best friend.

The strength of the film is in it's expertly played and written sight gags, from Shaun's aforementioned ignorant stroll through the neighborhood, to an attempt to dupe zombies by pretending to be zombies. Pegg makes for a particularly engaging hero. He makes his likable loafer even more winning the more dangerous things get.

The longer the movie goes on, the less funny it gets. By the end, we're firmly entrenched in traditional horror tropes. The result is a movie much like what Romero practically patented, the dwindling cast in a standoff with the evergrowing horde outside the walls, with dashes of Sam Raimi and early Peter Jackson. The grossest moment involves a character literally being torn apart tthough it's a moment punctuated by comic insanity.! Since we've grown to like the characters - a hard feat for even a comic horror movie - the loss of life is genuinely sad and by the time that the movie reaches its climax, we realize it has transcended its goopy origins. "Shaun of the Dead" isn't just a witty reinvention of an old chestnut, but a film with a genuine identity of it's own. Alternately weird, silly, smart, moving, funny and scary, "Shaun of the Dead" is potentially a cult classic that's in a field of its own.

Salles reveals the story of Che

By Jamie Morvane

Gael Garcia Bernal wants to know why Britney Spears wears a Che Guevara T-shirt. Does the pop singer know anything about the man behind the Cuban Revolution?

"[Guevara] might be very famous in a way, or incredibly well-known, but in most cases it's just the icon that people recognize. The icon has no 3-dimensionality, it's only pictures," the actor said on a recent visit to Chicago to discuss his role as the infamous revolutionary in "The Motorcycle Diaries." "Britney Spears wears a T-shirt of Che Guevara and it'd be interesting to see what she has to say about it."

Mexican born Bernal is right to wonder. Many people are familiar with the popular black silk-screened image of the revolutionary sporting a beret, but just as many do not know what came before. In this Walter Salles-directed, Robert Redford-produced film, Bernal's mission is to enlighten, to bring Guevara, whose opposition to the United States intervention in Latin America led to his 1967 assassination, to life for moviegoers.

Based on Ernesto "Che" Guevara's memoirs, namely "The Motorcycle Diaries," and his close friend Alberto Granado's "Traveling with Che Guevara," the film tells a poignant tale not of a hostile anarchist but of a 23-year-old on a journey to discover the world he only knew from books and in turn, to discover himself.

The film begins in January 1952 in Buenos Aires, Argentina, where Guevara was a medical student specializing in leprology. His friend is 29-year-old Alberto Granado [Rodrigo de la Serna], a biochemist. The two embark on a motorcycle trip across South America on Granado's 1939 Norton 500, which he calls "La Poderosa" or "The Mighty One." The goal is to complete the journey on Granado's 50th birthday, but "The Mighty One" is anything but mighty throughout their trip and Guevara battles severe asthma, something so insignificant, yet unthinkable, of such a powerful figure.

In eight months, the two men grew as close as brothers and traveled more than 8,000 miles. What was once a fun-filled voyage became a more profound journey that neither of them had expected. They encountered everyone from wealthy countrymen to homeless miners searching for work to lepers [portrayed by actual lepers], all of whom aided in illustrating the infinite inequalities that plagued South America. But Guevara, who helped those no one would help and gave a voice to those who had no voice, saw that there was hope. After realizing they were forever transformed on their trip, Guevara and Granado were determined to make a difference. As the film's maxim goes, "Let the world change you and you can change the world." Bernal, who starred in Alfonso Cuaron's Academy Award-nominated "Y Tu Mama Tambien," said, "I just relate very strongly to [Guevara] and in a way it was very heavy and overwhelming to play this character. We prepared exhaustingly for six months, and then I still didn't feel ready. I wanted to do it well. It's who I am." Bernal continued, "And all the information we had – it wasn't enough. [Guevara] needed our experiences to be alive [on screen]. Eventually, I could use my voice. I didn't have to make it overly dramatic or heroic."

The finished product shows Bernal playing Guevara for the second time in his career – the first time was for the 2002 mini-series "Fidel."

"The fact that I did it before made me want to do it again – right," Bernal said.

It seems he nailed it with "The Motorcycle Diaries," in which he went to extremes – mentally and physically – even going so far as to swim across the Amazon River, which he said was "the best," but wouldn't recommend it for others.

Overall, the film is "a great transcendence to what's going on in the world," Bernal said. "It really shows that politics is about the person, not the contingents of a political party. ... Democracy is very fishy. There's no real representation or way of governing. The U.S. is not a great nation, it's a great people."

Bernal hopes "The Motorcycle Diaries" will inspire people everywhere, as it inspired him.

"It re-affirmed my priorities and challenged me. It's an approach, a pathway to knowledge. You can understand the human condition and work to change it," he said. "I'll only do a movie if there's something meaningful. ... It's not for the money. If it was, I'd be living in L.A. and trying to be a star."

That won't be necessary. In January 2004 – 52 years after that original journey began – "The Motorcycle Diaries" world-premiered at the Sundance Film Festival. It was met with a standing ovation. The film opens in Chicago theaters early October.

addict, then orally pleases her in the middle of the road. Knoxville gives her a business card, and needless to say, it wouldn't be long before Stickles would put the digits to use.

The accident claims Sylvia as the twelfth apostle of a group of sex addicts that have formed in her city and meet in Ray-Ray's garage. Each one of the apostles has suffered a concussion before and has found a new addiction to many varieties of sexual deviances. This includes, but certainly is not limited to, a police officer who has succumbed to infantilism, a convenience store worker who is attracted to dirt, and even Stickles own daughter, Caprice Stickles (Selma Blair), who is otherwise known by locals as Ursula Udders because of her, well, extremely large mammary glands.

After being introduced to most of the group, Sylvia is told that they are on a quest to discover a new sex act, and that she is the twelfth apostle, the chosen member that will lead them to this act. While the path seems destined to the deviant dozen, a select group of the city, including Mr. Stickles and Sylvia's mother (Mink Stole), have formed a group called the Neuters. "Neuter" is a term coined for the sexless portion of the city. So, the plot doesn't necessarily thicken from there. I could reveal more, but hey, this isn't a Kenneth Branagh film, and I don't expect to see this film discussed on "Inside the Actors Studio" any day soon. There are, however, some interesting aspects to the film that do warrant mentioning. First, the movie is rated NC-17, the equivalent to the old rating of XXX. While movies have had this rating in the past, most studios will not grant permission for a movie with this rating; it's just bad business. Luckily, Waters' fans will rejoice to know that Fine Line Features was up to the task of helping this film make it to screens nationally.

The Prince of Puke began his illustrious film career in the 1960s in Baltimore. He used to rent out halls in churches and use leaflets to spread the word of his films. Today Waters is a professor of film and subculture at the European Graduate School in Saas-Fee, Switzerland. It is funny how things change.

I believe it is safe to say that America has become a more sensitive country since the birth of John Waters, yet it appears that Waters reveals some of society's insecure topics in his movies. In "A Dirty Shame," he toys with the idea of Americans being all too concerned with what other people do in the bedroom. I think most people would be disgusted with some of the perverse sexual acts that are strewn about in the film, but this can only be to the glee of Waters.

Sit back, enjoy the show, and try to avoid concussions. The Pope of Trash is back, and he has a whole new bag of tricks.

Vets can't hang them up

By David Pollak
Knight Ridder

SAN JOSE, CA (AP) — Perhaps future Hall of Famers Jerry Rice and Tim Brown can one day look each other in the eye and ask: What happened to us?

Rice, 41, caught zero passes a week ago — zero! — for the first time since 1985. Brown was more involved for the Raos, with seven receptions. But the man with a career average of 13.7 yards per catch gets about half that now. And Tampa Bay's injury-riddled roster is so thin that Brown is the NFL's senior punt returner, at 38.

So a second question may follow:

Is it time?

"Very seldom do we know it's time to hang it up," said Jim Plunkett, the former Stanford quarterback who kept his own NFL career going until he reached 40. "Usually we all have to be told by someone else — not that they're necessarily right."

Former NFL players are not inclined to pass judgment on Rice and Brown for extending their careers past their prime. Talk with even a handful of them and it is evident that there's no formula for determining when it's time to run off the field for keeps.

Plunkett thought he could still play until then-Raiders coach Mike Shanahan told him in 1988 that his days as a Raider were over — and no other NFL team showed interest. Former 49ers running back Roger Craig woke up one morning at 33 and knew it was time to move on. Center Randy Cross figured out more gradually that his level of play had dropped after 13 years as a 49er. Defensive back Rod Woodson, who finished last season with the Raiders, let his knee make the decision.

And wide receiver Lynn Swann, whose nine-year career with Pittsburgh could easily have been extended beyond the 1982 season, treated it strictly as a business matter. Broadcasting beckoned.

"Could I have played another two or three years? Absolutely. Did I leave something behind? Absolutely," said Swann, whose 16.5 yards per reception helped put him in the Hall of Fame. "But that was OK. I didn't think the opportunity presented to me by ABC would be there the next year, and so I took it."

He turns to the words of NBA legend Julius Erving in explaining how most pro athletes look at retirement (even though Swann didn't follow the advice). "He said, I'd rather play one year too long than one year too few," said Swann, 52, who is one of ABC's more visible analysts. "If you get out thinking you've still got something to give, you'll always regret it."

For most players, Swann said, multimillion-dollar salaries are a big incentive to keep playing. But there are others: the camaraderie, the challenge and the crowds.

There's also ego — and, Swann said, don't buy into the idea that some players are such nice guys that they don't have one. "Every guy on that field believes 100 percent in himself and his ability to beat the guy on the other side. Every guy's got an ego," he said, "and it's tough to swallow when they tell you We're going to put you on the bench."

Swann said he never wanted to face that moment. Other players have been willing to make the accommodation.

Craig spent the final two years of his career with Minnesota. With the Raiders in 1991, he carried the ball 162 times; with the Vikings, that number dropped to 105, then 38. That wasn't a problem, he said. He knew his role was to help younger players develop.

"When Dennis Green called me to come to Minnesota, he said, 'Roger, I need you to lead the ship, to show these guys what it takes to be a champion,'" said Craig, now the director of business development for Tibco Software. "I didn't look for anything more or say I deserved to get this or that. It's all about adjusting."

Early in his final season, Craig knew in an instant that the end was near.

"Normally I was the first guy in and the last one to leave the football field," he said. "One morning I just could not do it. I didn't have the same passion. I didn't want to hurt myself, I didn't want to hurt the team."

That internal wake-up call never came for Plunkett. He didn't get the message until the Raiders showed him the door. Plunkett was willing to make the adjustment Craig talked about, but the chance never came.

"When I got released, I was hoping to hear from another team," said Plunkett, who entered the NFL in 1971 with New England. "If I got a call, I knew I could help in one fashion or another. I could help with a young player during practice, but if I had to step on the field, I could do that as well."

The phone didn't ring.

Ironically, there were times a decade earlier with the 49ers when Plunkett considered calling it quits.

"I was getting the crap beat out of me," said Plunkett, now a TV co-host for Oakland's Silver & Black show. "Sometimes I felt that maybe I should just do something else for my own health. My brain was telling me I'm taking a licking here and it's not going anywhere and I don't feel good afterward. Psychologically, we were losing, but it was more than that. It was the losing and the fans being on you, and the press being on you.

"But I stuck it out and fortunately it turned out the way it did," said Plunkett, who went on to lead the Raiders to Super Bowl championships in the 1980 and 1983 seasons.

Unlike Plunkett, who faults his final coach for hastening his exit from the game, Cross credits Bill Walsh for making the process smoother.

"That was one of the things he was very very good at," Cross said. "He'd have talks with people. It was generally at a pretty positive time in their careers. You'd get that, 'You have two or three more effective years left,' which gave you kind of a window that most players just don't have."

Cross, now an analyst with CBS, said he was getting an inkling that it was time to quit throughout his final season. "I could have kept playing, but my play in general definitely wasn't up to the kind of football I expected out of myself," said Cross, who ended his NFL career after the 49ers' Super Bowl win over Cincinnati following the 1988 season.

Hamm fighting for his gold

The USOC's lead attorney, Jeff Benz, said he argued three points:

— That the court could not make decisions on "field-of-play" issues — in other words, on judgment calls made by officials during the competition.

— That the South Koreans didn't protest in time for there to be any change in the results.

— That simply adding 0.1 points to Yang's score wouldn't give an accurate reflection of the results because there was another event to go after the disputed parallel bars, and nobody knows what would have happened had the scores been different heading in.

"We are confident we were able to express ourselves to arbitrators to the fullest extent possible in a way they understood," Benz said.

The International Gymnastics Federation, known as FIG, acknowledged the scoring error and suspended three judges for the rest of the games. It said repeatedly that it would not change the results because the South Koreans didn't file a protest in time.

FIG president Bruno Grandi confused the issue, however, when he sent a letter to Hamm asking him to surrender the medal voluntarily. In the letter, Grandi wrote, "The true winner of the all-around competition is Yang Tae-young."

USA Gymnastics President Bob Colarossi said the competition should have been considered closed the moment the results were published.

"It's a bad precedent to look at field-of-play calls in court," he said. "There's a human element in sport. There are always going to be some things that happen that on review might have gone differently."

CAS traditionally does not involve itself in "field-of-play" decisions, but Tae-Young had nowhere else to go. The USOC rejected the South Korean's plea for a duplicate gold medal and is spending about $300,000 to defend Hamm.

"We're extremely proud of what Paul accomplished," USOC spokesman Darryl Seibel said.

If the Patriots beat the Bills, they should be favored to go 4-0 and set a record of 19 consecutive wins. That's because their next game is at home against struggling Miami in the opener of a three-game homestand that includes two unbeaten teams, Seattle and the New York Jets.

Miami is one of the five teams that shares the 18-win record, having accomplished it by going 17-0, including three playoff wins, in 1972 then winning the opener in 1973. The streak ended with a 12-7 loss at Oakland, then Miami won its next 10 games and went on to capture its second straight NFL title. The Dolphins were 32-2 over those two seasons.

The other teams NFL sharing the record are Chicago in 1933-34 and again in 1941-42, San Francisco in 1989-90 and Denver in 1997-98. The Cleveland Browns also won 18 straight in 1947-48 but were in the All American Football Conference.

One task facing the Patriots is getting into a regular-season routine. They opened the season on a Thursday night, then had their next game 10 days later then followed that with the bye week.

"We're going to be able to start a regular rhythm and get on track as far as having a scheduled standard plan that we do week in and week out," defensive end Richard Seymour said.

Just as they've gotten into a year-long rhythm of winning that has brought them to the brink of an NFL record victory streak.

"Obviously, we'd love to be a part of history and be successful that way," linebacker Roman Phifer said, "but it's not going to really make a difference as far as us trying to achieve our goal, which is to win championships."

Hamm's medal in limbo

By Sam Cage
Associated Press

LAUSANNE, Switzerland (AP) — Paul Hamm fought to keep his Olympic gymnastics gold medal Monday during an 11 and 1/2-hour hearing before the sports world's highest court, and the panel adjourned without making a decision.

Three Court of Arbitration for Sports arbitrators convened to hear the appeal from a South Korean who lost the gold medal in the all-around at the Athens Olympics after a scoring error by the judges.

CAS General Secretary Matthieu Reeb said the arbitrators — from Germany, Kenya and Britain — hoped to make a decision within the next two weeks.

Yang Tae-young wants the court to order international gymnastics officials to change the rankings, give him the gold and give Hamm the silver. Hamm and the U.S. Olympic Committee spent the hearing fighting Tae-young's appeal.

"I thought everything went very smoothly," Hamm said in a teleconference after the hearing. "It was a very fair hearing and everyone got the chance to say what they thought."

Yang, who finished with a bronze, was mistakenly docked 0.100 points on the start value of his next-to-last routine, the parallel bars. He finished third, 0.049 points behind Hamm, who became the first American man to win gymnastics' biggest prize.

With the extra 0.100, Yang would have finished 0.051 points ahead of Hamm. That, however, assumes everything in the final rotation would have played out the same way.

"The issue is whether this (mistake) affected the result," Reeb said.

South Korean officials declined comment following the hearing.

the program to be a three-time All-America (honorable mention in '94 and '96, first team in '95). She was also a three-time All-New England and All-Atlantic 10.

Current assistant coach Rebecca Myers was part of the dynamic squads from the early 90's too, earning All-America honors during her freshman and sophomore years ('93 and '94), and racking up plenty of A-10 honors, including Rookie of the Year and four All-A-10 selections.

Wilkins, Lynch and Myers were crucial parts of that famed 1993 squad, which made the NCAA Final Four and lost to eventual champion North Carolina, but none were more crucial than Brianna Scurry.

A two-time Olympic gold medallist and Women's World Cup champion, the Minnesota native managed to make only one All-America squad—in '93, as a second teamer. The 1993 Adidas Goalkeeper of the Year owns a career Goals Against Average of 0.56, fifth all-time at UMass. She ranks second in the saves column with 368 as well as shutouts, with 37.

Drop the name to anybody around the University of Massachusetts and they will all tell you the same thing.

"Bri Scurry, she's the best," Rudy said.

There have been some great players, and some great games like the triple overtime thriller over Harvard in 1996 that advanced them to the Sweet 16, but that isn't to take anything away from the current squad in progress.

"This is the first I've heard of it," freshman Vanessa Lima said, when asked to comment on Rudy's milestone win.

Jim Rudy won his 200th game coaching for UMass yesterday.

"Rudy didn't really say anything to us [about the 200th win]," junior forward Adair Blyler said. "But this is great for him. There's nothing better than achieving a win like this."

Now that the word is out, everything is calm once again at Rudd Field. For now.

some heavy pressure in the Crusader zone, with Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather, Lindsey Bellini and Caelyn Caldwell taking plenty of shots. But Holy Cross did a fine job of exposing the weak Maroon and White counterattack for what it was, and managed to get their fair share of breakaways.

MATTHEW BIBB/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Tina Rodriguez plays the ball against Holy Cross.

The Minutewomen battled back and forth throughout the first half, with Fairweather notching the first goal of the game, a great turn-and-shoot feed from Bellini, in the 37th minute.

The Crusaders immediately bounced back with a goal of their own four minutes later, when junior midfielder Allison Hayes took a swift pass from Lauren Pereira just inside the 18-yard box from the left side and booted one upwards toward the top right corner. The shot deflected backwards off goalie Kristin Walker's hands, and just like that the women were playing even again.

"The first half, I thought we did a good job. We had our opportunities, and they did too," junior forward Adair Blyler said.

But there was a serious change in momentum from then on favoring the Maroon and White. However, it came at the expense of Bellini, who went down early in the second half with a rib injury.

In came freshman Vanessa Lima, who provided an instant spark to the offense. No more than four minutes later, fellow frosh Jenny Roehrig took a pitch from Lima and found the back of the net to put the Minutewomen up for good, 2-1. But they were not done yet.

"Part of that change in the second half was we changed our formation, bringing back another defender," Blyler said. "That really helped out the defense. We had a much quicker attack, even though we had one less scorer."

How fitting it was, then, that UMass's fastest player, freshman Britt Canfield, was next to tally a score. Taking a feed near midfield from Blyler, Canfield went on a fast break before firing from the right side just inside the 18-yard box, a shot that rolled wide of Jessica Pietrowicz to make it 3-1.

After tallying a goal, Canfield quickly returned to the bench. "

The Minutewomen tallied one final insurance goal with just over three minutes to go. Liz Weinstein curled the ball right around the Holy Cross defense to Nadia Villarcel, who promptly dropped the ball off to a waiting Caitlin Footit for her first career goal.

UMass tops Crusaders

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After more than 18 years, and over 400 minutes of play, the Holy Cross women's soccer team finally registered a goal against the Massachusetts Minute-women yesterday afternoon at Rudd Field.

Holy Cross	1
UMass	4

Up until that point, the Crusaders (1-7) had been outscored 0-14 in their four meetings with UMass.

But unfortunately, one swift shot to the back of the net was all the Crusaders would be able to muster, as the Maroon and White went on to thump Holy Cross 4-1, giving head coach Jim Rudy his 200th win as coach of UMass (12-5).

Number 200 came on the heels of several nicely put together goals, including a last-minute thread through the defense that set up freshman Caitlin Foote for her first career goal.

But it was only after the Minutewomen nullified the absorb-and-react style of play by the Crusaders that they were able to put some numbers up on the scoreboard.

"We didn't do a good job in the first half," Rudy said. "We definitely got a little greedy, even before we scored. I felt like we took them for granted, and they're a tough team. They're resilient; they hang in there. They gave us everything we could handle — they don't quit."

Rudy wins number 200

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Following his 200th win as women's soccer coach at the University of Massachusetts, Jim Rudy was greeted with a hug from goalkeeper Kristin Rutland.

"Congratulations on your 200th win, coach," Rutland said.

"Well, it's nice to know that I have it now," he replied with a grin.

Like some other coaches around the University of Massachusetts, Rudy doesn't pay too much attention to numbers. But when a significant one like this — his 200th win as a coach at UMass — comes around, you can bet he is all smiles.

"It feels good, now that I know about it," Rudy said with a chuckle.

Faster than you can say "goal," however, his voice gets softer and he becomes more serious — and a bit more emotional.

"I'm pleased for it. UMass has given me a great opportunity here," Rudy said, "I came up here from Orlando, Florida, and it was a good move. I'll never regret coming here."

Perhaps that's partly due to some of the great teams he's assembled, and the great players that composed them.

Be it at Central Florida — where his teams were national powerhouses year in and year out, and former Olympian Michelle Akers was the main attraction — or UMass, Rudy has carried a sense of pride throughout his career.

"I've coached a long time, and I've coached a lot of good players. That'll get you 200 real quick," Rudy said.

And there were a lot of them.

There was Paula Wilkins, a 1993 All-America first team who Rudy regards as the shrewdest tactician to ever come through his program. A great leader, her skills have paid off in the form of the head coaching job at Penn State.

Erin Lynch was another of those dynamic players, a fiery defender from Austin, Texas. A two time Atlantic 10 Player of the Year (1994 and '95), she is the only player in the history of

Men's soccer to face Terriers

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-4) will head down the Mass Pike tomorrow to begin a five-game road stand, starting against Boston University (2-4, 1-0 America East).

UMass is coming off a 3-2, overtime victory over New Hampshire last Wednesday, a game in which sophomore Rob Charest scored his second golden goal of the season. In the 99th minute, Charest capitalized on a breakaway pass from junior captain Oral Bullen and netted the game winner for his second goal of the game.

A week prior, in another two-goal performance, Charest led the Maroon and White to victory over Hartford with a sudden-death tally in the 104th minute.

After struggling to score goals in the early going (two in the first three games), the Massachusetts offense is starting to show promise.

Bullen, held scoreless in the first three games, picked up two goals in a win over Siena (Sept. 17) and another goal against Hartford on Sept. 14. He leads the team with seven points on three goals and one assist.

"We just need to keep finding ways to score," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We keep getting chances and if we play the way we're capable of there shouldn't be a problem."

For one of the youngest teams in the country — UMass fields a squad of 17 freshman and sophomores and only two seniors — The Minutemen have found a way to get 11 different players on the scoresheet.

Aside from Charest and Bullen, four players have more than one point, three of which are freshman. Matty Lennie, Mike Mingione and Tyler Pigano have scored goals within the first four weeks of their collegiate careers, helping to answer the largest pre-season question mark.

"We need it. We need freshman production if we are going to be successful," Koch said. "Unfortunately, it took longer than we wanted for everyone to get adjusted but I expect many more goals from all the freshman."

A UMass victory tomorrow will mean the Maroon and White overcame the hurdle of scoring on the road. The Minutemen have scored twelve goals at home compared to only two on the road.

The game will act as preparation for Atlantic 10 play, which begins Friday at St. Joseph's for UMass, but also holds special meaning for Koch.

In his 15th season with the Minutemen, Koch is poised one win shy of 150 for his UMass career. He is already the winningest coach in program history and has racked up 208 collegiate victories over a 20-year career.

But even with a win, Koch is unlikely to publicly celebrate reaching the 150-win milestone.

"Whatever win it is doesn't matter so long as it helps us get ready for Friday's conference game," Koch said. "We're concentrating on the task at hand and trying not getting distracted by outside things ... BU's going to give us enough to worry about."

Unfortunately for UMass, they will kick off at Nickerson Field tomorrow at what might be the worst possible time. BU is fresh off Saturdays 2-0 victory over defending-league champion Binghamton and riding the coattails of a two game unbeaten streak.

Boston University started the season slow, loosing the first four contests, but bounced back with a 3-2 overtime victory over Rhode Island Sept. 22, a win that snapped the Bearcats 20-game regular-season undefeated streak.

The two Terrier victories have come against nationally ranked opponents, with Binghamton sitting at No. 20 and Rhode Island ranked No. 24.

UMass did fare better against then No. 9 Notre Dame however, Massachusetts and BU's only common foe. UMass tied the Irish 0-0 during a preseason match August 28, while Boston University lost 2-0 on Sept. 3.

"It's always a good game when we play BU," Koch said. "They have a good team that is big and strong and I'm sure it will be a very difficult game. We just need to make sure we take care of the ball and don't make too many mistakes."

The key to UMass success may be the neutralization of the three-pronged attack of Erik Evjen, Roland Erlichman and Steve Gahl, a trio of Terriers who lead the team with two goals each.

The Minutemen will not play another home game at Rudd Field until October 18.

Sophomore defender Michael Donnelly goes to clear the ball for UMass. The Minutemen take on Boston University today at 7 p.m.

Coaches bring class to UMass

Bob McGovern

Amidst the excitement of football, basketball, and recently hockey, soccer has fallen by the wayside here at the University of Massachusetts. Except for the few that show up at Rudd Field during the balmy fall days of Western Mass., the two teams go relatively unnoticed, year in and year out.

This is not to say that either team is unsuccessful. In fact, UMass soccer has been at the forefront of the New England soccer over the past decade. Most, if not all of this, is due to two coaches who are approaching or have already achieved milestones.

Yesterday women's soccer coach Jim Rudy notched his 200th win at UMass with a 4-1 victory over Holy Cross. Today, men's soccer coach Sam Koch is looking to ring up number 150 as the Minutemen travel east to take on Boston University.

Both have won a majority of their games coaching for UMass and have become staples in the New England soccer scene. Rudy and Koch have won a total of 349 games and all with a small amount of scholarships in relation to the nation's elite.

Perhaps Rudy's 200th and Koch's 150th won't be the biggest news in UMass athletics this year, but these marks are a testament to what both have brought to their respective programs. Even with a relatively small fan base, both have brought top caliber soccer to the Pioneer Valley and have only four losing seasons between them.

Koch came into UMass with a very tricky situation on his hands for a first-year coach. The Minutemen were slated to be rebuilt at the end of Koch's first season (1981), so he was basically there to set the floundering program to rest.

Now, 14 years later, Koch has taken UMass from the veritable doormat of New England soccer, and turned it into a respected force in the Northeast. Koch has already broken the all-time wins record at UMass (125), which was set by legendary Lawrence Briggs who coached the Minutemen for 37 years.

Rudy, who is already far and away the winningest coach in UMass women's soccer history, is starting to get his name heard around the country. With yesterday's win, Rudy not only won his 200th game at UMass, but also picked up win number 274 for his career, making him the fourth winningest coach in collegiate women's soccer history.

Perhaps the most amazing accomplishment that these coaches have brought to UMass can't be seen on a stat sheet. On September 8, 2002 Rudd Field was dedicated to the University of Massachusetts as the home of UMass soccer.

Previous to this groundbreaking addition, the soccer teams were playing most of their games on a patch next to Sylvan. Soccer was out of the way for the bulk of campus, on a pitch a fraction of the quality of Rudd.

Andrew and Jinny Rudd, who were long-time fans of UMass soccer and the parents of UMass soccer player Alexandra Rudd, gave $500,000 of the money needed. More than $100,000 extra was given from a strong UMass fan base.

Soccer will never bring in the same crowd size that the bigger sports draw, but luckily that's not always the measuring stick for success. Both of these coaches have been around and weathered the storms that come from coaching sparsely funded programs and have come out on top.

Numbers don't always tell the whole story, but for Rudy and Koch, 200 and 150 are a good way to start.

Patriots wary to mention win streak

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO (AP) — The New England Patriots returned from their bye week to face the same question they'd heard before they left: What about The Streak?

Their answer was the same: What streak?

Sure, they know they haven't lost a regular-season or playoff game in a very long time, although 11 of them weren't with the team last season. In fact, Tuesday is the first anniversary of their last loss, 20-17 at Washington, in a game they had a chance to win in the final minute.

Since then, the Patriots have won 17 games, including their second Super Bowl in three years. That's one less than the NFL record shared by five teams, but they know it will be tough to tie it if they don't focus only on their next game.

And that happens to be on Sunday in the same stadium where they suffered their only other loss last season, a 31-0 season-opening rout at Buffalo.

"You can talk about streaks all day, but I've never heard a player in here say anything about it," center Dan Koppen said. "It's always been the media."

On Monday, there were more reporters than players in the locker room during the 45-minute media access period. It was the players' first work day since last Thursday, and they have their regular day off Tuesday before resuming preparations for the Bills.

Buffalo is 0-2, losing both games 13-10, and has a new coach, Mike Mularkey, after a 6-10 season cost Gregg Williams his job.

"They're only a couple of plays away from being 2-0," Patriots safety Rodney Harrison said, "so we can't look at their record because, just like (Sunday), who thought Houston was going to beat Kansas City. It doesn't matter what record you have."

The only record that matters this week to Harrison is 3-0, not the record for consecutive wins.

"To be honest with you, I did not even think about the streak until you just mentioned it," Harrison insisted. "Really, I'm telling you. Guys are not even thinking about the streak. We are thinking about going up in there and just beating Buffalo.

"We're trying to win a game and, if it happens to continue the streak, that's fine. But we're just trying to win that one game in the division that's going to help us get to 3-0."

Senate Elections for SGA postponed over turmoil surrounding pictures

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante and the SGA Elections Commission announced yesterday that the senate elections originally scheduled for today and tomorrow in various Dining Commons have been postponed until next week.

After extensive debate, the elections were indefinitely called off last night just after 10 p.m., amid the controversial circumstances surrounding the eight other officials from the SGA and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy engaged in drinking in the SCERA office.

Several of the pictures also show a drawing on a dry-erase board depicting Higgins as a Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan. The photographs were uncovered last weekend by an unknown member of the African Latino Asian and Native American group.

The elections were rescheduled for Wednesday, Oct. 6 and Thursday, Oct. 7.

"After much thought about this, it is extremely important, and we want to nail it," Bustamante said. "We want students to know the candidates better."

Bustamante hopes that students will now make a more educated choice on a candidate now that they have an additional week to do research.

Among the problems that prevented the elections from taking place was the SGA's struggle to achieve a full Coordinating Council and election staff.

"There are extenuating circumstances," he said, "we've never had a large number of Coordinating Council not be here, not to mention a Speaker and Associate Speaker."

Bustamante told The Collegian last night that Higgins plans to formally resign today.

"This is also a chance for students to take their names off the ballots," he said, referring to the others photographed — some of who are running for Senate seats.

By SGA rule, Chancellor of Elections Viktoryia Brohnsheyn made the final decision to postpone today's vote.

"She had very limited time," Bustamante said. "She had less than one month before elections to prepare; she really wants to make sure that she nails it."

Last week, controversy arose when it was discovered that the 10 election commissioners needed to man the polling stations were not returning from last year.

Speaker Higgins appointed a professional staff to assist — an unprecedented move by an SGA speaker. However, he was not able to compile a full roster.

"We found enough people, we found staff — students, faculty and grad students and I thank them for it, but this is extremely important because the student body is about to show a huge interest in elections," Bustamante said.

If elections were to proceed as initially planned, there was a strong likelihood that they would be thrown out because of violations of SGA bylaws. Bustamante's initial election to the office of president was originally thrown out in March because of bylaw violations in the election process.

"[SGA] has been too dark for too long and it would be discouraging to the students to throw out another election," he said.

He also said that he feared students would lose faith in the SGA if the elections were discarded.

Bustamante said he is anxious to move forward with a newly appointed Senate, so that the SGA can get to the process of governance.

If Speaker Higgins does indeed resign as planned, Associate Speaker Seamus Brennan — also pictured in the photos — would be automatically appointed Speaker.

If both Higgins and Brennan resign, the newly elected Senate will ratify the elections and then vote internally on the appointment of a new Speaker and Associate Speaker.

Bustamante said that the election postponement, as well as this week's controversy surrounding the photographs, slowed his ability to push forward with his agenda.

President of the SGA Eduardo Bustamante holds a press conference before announcing elections are postponed.

However, he said he proceeds to keep working on his goals for the year, including the implementation of a textbook rental system.

"[The photograph incident] has already slowed me down," he said. "Everyone is just saturated with the controversy, we just have to keep working."

We the Elections Commission feel that due to the circumstances involving the SGA and the curret condition of the Elections Commission, feel that this is in the best interest of the student body to postpone the Senate elections. We hope that this time will allow students to become better educated on the candidates as well as he election process, and also to allow or staff to become more familiar with the elections process.

We feel that becuase of the importance of the SGA and the senate body, thier commitment to the student body and the student's rights which we strive to protect, that postponing these elections is the honorable thing to do.

New Linux IBM computer laboratory opens in Machmer

By Kaitlin Barry
Collegian Correspondent

The College of Social and Behavioral Sciences hosted an open house last Wednesday to showcase the new Linux Open-Source Software Teaching Lab with 20 new IBM computers in Machmer Hall to approximately 40 students and faculty members.

"Linux is an operating system that is becoming a potential rival to Windows. Computer scientists and engineers use this operating system all the time," said Charlie Schweik, lab principal investigator and joint faculty member in both the Center for Public Policy and Administration and the Department of Natural Resource Conservation.

IBM and an anonymous donor from Amherst Computer Works offered over $100,000 to create the new teaching lab, among the first of its kind in the nation. IBM also donated the salaries for Aaltonen and Jacobson to install the lab this summer and to administer the lab this year as IBM co-ops. Dee Weber of the Social and Demographic Research Institute will be responsible for lab management.

The College of Social and Behavioral Sciences provided the space for the lab in Machmer.

Schweik said that with the new lab, students and faculty within departments such as Biology, Political Science, and Management will have the opportunity to use computers to further their studies.

Schweik discussed the history of the project at the event and introduced Oliver Aaltonen and John Jacobson, two UMass students who installed the lab this summer. Aaltonen presented a demonstration on the Linux operating system at the open house.

Mark Hanny and Scott MacPhetres, the representatives from IBM responsible for the donation of equipment, software, and co-support, joined the celebration, along with Dean Janet Rifkin of CSBS.

"IBM sees Linux and open-source software as a new business model for them. They see this as a way to move people away from Microsoft Windows products. IBM has embraced the open-source paradigm," said Schweik.

IBM intends to meet the escalating demand for skilled professionals in the technology field this year and will rely on universities, such as UMass, to prepare students for such positions.

"The lab is intended to expose UMass students to the Linux computer operating system and open-source software. Open-source software is typically free and available on the Internet. The 'Open Office' productivity suite is freely downloadable and has features that are similar to Microsoft Word. Potentially, this could save students money," said Schweik. "Also, programs can be modified by the user and redistributed because of the innovative alternative licensing. A user can improve a program or fix a problem."

IBM co-op Jacobson, mathematics major with a concentration in computing and computer science minor, witnessed the excitement about Linux and open-source software at the open house.

"Many students whom I spoke with were very excited about the lab, saying, 'This is a great thing.' 'How can I get an account?' 'When is the lab open,' said Jacobson.

"I had a faculty member

UMass Professor receives grant for book research

By Sarah Freddie
Collegian Correspondent

Manisha Sinha, an associate professor at the University of Massachusetts, received a $40,000 National Humanities grant in order to research her latest book, "Redefining Democracy: African Americans and the Movement to Abolish Slavery, 1775-1865," which is under contract with Harvard University Press.

Sinha said the grant is enabling her to research and prepare for her book.

Sinha, a specialist in 19th century U.S. History, is on leave for a year while doing research for her book. At the University, Sinha teaches Introduction to African American History. She also conducts "project seminars and honors seminars on slavery and abolition for Commonwealth College."

Professor Manisha Sinha received a $40,000 grant to aid her research on a new book.

Sinha's accomplishments do not end there. In 2003, she was selected to participate in the Distinguished Lectureship Series of the Organization of American Historians, and she also mentors grad students.

Sinha, a woman of Indian descent, has chosen to write books and embark in a career on African American studies and history.

"I am originally from India and as a woman of color identify greatly with the struggles of African Americans in this country," she said. "Of course, there is no parallel between the historic oppressions suffered by African Americans and the obstacles faced by immigrants to this country from anywhere at any point in its history."

The basis of Sinha's new book is the attitude of African Americans during the Abolition Movement. "The primary focus [of the book] 'Redefining Democracy' is to explain how African American abolitionists helped to determine goals and ideas during the movement," she said.

Sinha said that even though African Americans were not allowed to vote during the Abolition Movement, they were able to help determine the tactics of the movement through their participation in public arenas.

"Just because African Americans couldn't participate in public life, they were able to develop a public intellectual protest tradition," she said.

This tradition enabled them to have their political opinions heard, increasing the intensity of the abolition movement during a politically unjust time period.

Prior to this book, Sinha had written and published another book entitled "The Counterrevolution of Slavery (2000)." She has also co-edited with John Bracey the two volumes, "African American Mosaic: A Documentary History of African Americans from the Slave Trade to the Twenty First Century."

When asked why she decided to write her new book, Sinha said that she wrote it because she wanted to look at the opposite side of her previous book and focus on the study of black abolitionist ideology instead.

Sinha has been researching for many months in preparation for her new book. She principally reads primary resources, such as leaflets, pamphlets and other documentation written by African Americans during the Abolitionist Movement. She has sought out "primary resources that were not easily accessible."

"Redelining Dentocracy: African Americans and the Movement to Abolish Slavery, 1775-1865," is due out in a year to a year-and-half, Sinha said.

Finneran deprives state of contested legislative elections

By Jennifer Peter
Associated Press

BOSTON — With his abrupt resignation, House Speaker Thomas Finneran has deprived the state's newly energized Republican Party of one of its most potent symbols just five weeks before this fall's hotly — contested legislative elections.

For years, Republicans have relied on Finneran, a powerful leader known for brokering back — room deals and quashing dissension, as a one — word campaign slogan for everything they believe is wrong with Beacon Hill.

In 2002, the Boston Democrat was a leading member of the infamous "Gang of Three" — a trio of longtime Beacon Hill Democrats that Republican Gov. Mitt Romney ran against successfully as part of his quest to bring reform to the Statehouse.

His name has also been bandied about in the early weeks of the fall elections, with Republicans describing him as "the Democrats' most feared, controlling and vindictive party boss" in a fund — raising letter sent under Romney's name.

Even some of Finneran's most loyal followers in the House acknowledged that his decision Monday to leave the post to become the leader of a biotechnology trade organization will be a boon for their re—election bids.

"The governor appeared to be tying the noose of Finneran around our necks," said Rep. David Flynn, D — Bridgewater, who is in a competitive race.

House Ways and Means Chairman John Rogers, D — Norwood, who will become House Majority Leader, said the timing of Finneran's announcement was a "a political coup."

"I think the Romney playbook was designed to focus squarely on the personality of Tom Finneran," said Rogers, a Finneran loyalist.

Republicans, who are making an aggressive effort to cut into Democrats' overwhelming legislative majority, immediately changed tactics Tuesday, refocusing instead on the behind — closed — door manner in which the Democrats anointed another Boston insider as the new speaker, before any formal vote.

House Majority Leader Salvatore DiMasi, D—Boston, Finneran's second—in—command, became the speaker—elect over the weekend, after lining up support among House members and sitting down at his North End home with Rogers, who also sought the position. A formal vote is expected on Wednesday.

"It's just the passing of the crown from one longtime Beacon Hill pol to another," said Republican consultant Charley Manning, a political adviser to the state Republican Party. "When voters see their state representatives just marching in lockstep and handing the scepter of the speaker's office to the next politician in line, they'll know that nothing's changed."

While DiMasi is much more socially liberal than the conservative outgoing speaker, he has been a loyal second — in — command, enforcing many of Finneran's edicts.

"Sure, one of our targets is now gone, but it's doesn't change our message or our focus," said Tim O'Brien, executive director of the Massachusetts Republican Party. "DiMasi's just a taller Finneran."

But unlike Finneran, DiMasi is not a household name in Massachusetts and is unlikely to be carry the same punch as a campaign tool for the GOP.

"It will take them a while to demonize him," said Lou DiNatale, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts — Boston. "The 'gang of one' has escaped and he's on the run."

In 2002, Romney dubbed Finneran, incoming Senate President Robert Travaglini, and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Shannon O'Brien as the "Gang of Three," who would reign unchecked if he was not elected.

Republicans, who are fielding more than 100 candidates against Democratic incumbents in the fall elections, have been even more pointed this year. On the state Republican Web site, they tell voters that GOP candidates "offer the only alternative to the status quo on Beacon Hill, an establishment controlled by Tom Finneran and longtime friends of (former Senate President) Billy Bulger."

"I think it was pretty clear that I was going to be part of the Romney re-election efforts that are underway out there," Finneran said Tuesday, on his last day as speaker. "But each election has its own dynamic and its own intangibles and a lot depends on shoe leather and personality and not getting pushed around."

Florida suffers from Hurricane Jeanne

By Mike Schneider
Associated Press

VERO BEACH, Fla. — Janet Hettinger waited more than two days to return to her home on this city's barrier island, only to be told she couldn't go inside. Hurricane Jeanne had made it impossible.

"There's nothing to see anymore anyway," the 81-year-old Hettinger said Tuesday, putting her pointer finger to her temple and pretending to pull the trigger.

The five-story condo where she lived was severely damaged by Hurricane Frances early this month before Jeanne finished the job — ripped off facing, tearing through walls and leaving aluminum siding dangling.

Rebuilding, if residents decide to, would take about three years.

"I don't know if I will live that long. I'm ready to call it quits right now," Hettinger said.

Thousands of residents waited in a mile-long line Tuesday to finally get a chance to see the destruction Jeanne meted out in Vero Beach. Condo owners like Hettinger fared the worst, while most of the single-family homes seemed to have made it through.

As it churned north, the storm's remnants dumped torrential rain and spawned tornadoes. Two deaths in South Carolina on Monday were blamed on the tropical depression, and damage was widespread.

More than three inches of rain had fallen by Tuesday afternoon in Hagerstown, Md., and dozens of roads were closed because of flooding in Maryland's Appalachian foothills. The storms also spawned a tornado that hit the New Castle County, Md., Airport, the National Weather Service said.

At least six possible twisters were reported Monday in North Carolina, damaging more than 100 buildings. In South Carolina, a tornado killed one man while another died after his car ran off a rain-slicked highway.

Around storm-battered Florida, more than 5,300 people were staying in shelters, nearly 1.3 million homes and businesses were without power, and at least one insurance company was seeking state help because it was overwhelmed with claims.

The emotional toll mounted, too. Gov. Jeb Bush announced that domestic violence reports were spiking in areas hit by the four hurricanes that have slammed Florida in the past six weeks.

"Nerves are frayed and frustration levels run high," Bush said. "The stress of rebuilding a home or business can be overwhelming."

President Bush, the governor's brother, planned to make his fourth visit to Florida to tour storm-ravaged areas.

Combined, Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne have damaged more than one of every five Florida homes. The insurance industry was expecting claims this season to top two million, greatly exceeding the 700,000 claims filed 12 years ago in the aftermath of Hurricane Andrew, the nation's most destructive hurricane ever.

Tom Gallagher, who as Florida's chief financial officer oversees insurance regulation, estimated insured losses from this season's four storms at $18 billion, or $3 billion more than Andrew.

Last weekend, Jeanne killed at least six people in Florida, bearing down on the state with winds of 120 mph. The havoc caused by the four hurricanes prompted the largest relief effort ever undertaken by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

President Bush asked Congress late Monday for more than $7.1 billion to help Southeastern states recover from their lashing by four hurricanes. His third request for storm aid brings total possible funding to at least $12.2 billion.

Five Italian hostages released in Iraq

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Kidnappers released two female Italian aid workers and five other hostages Tuesday, raising hopes for at least 18 foreigners still in captivity. But insurgents showed no sign of easing their blood-soaked campaign against the U.S. presence in Iraq, staging a show of defiance in Samarra and striking twice with deadly force in Basra.It was unclear what prompted the two separate groups of kidnappers to release the Italians, three Egyptians and two Iraqis, and whether any ransom had been paid. It was the second day in a row that foreigners were freed.

The Italian women were wearing full black veils that revealed only their eyes as they were received by the Italian Red Cross in a Baghdad neighborhood, according to video broadcast by the Arab news station Al-Jazeera. Looking dazed but smiling, Simona Torretta lifted her veil and repeated, "Thank you," in Arabic. Simona Pari hesitated before also lifting her veil.

Later Tuesday, the two women were flown home aboard a Falcon 20 plane, arriving at a military airport in Rome shortly after 11 p.m. The two, now in long, white dresses, emerged smiling and held hands as they walked on the tarmac, their relatives by their side. Asked by reporters how she felt, Pari just said, "Good."

Pari and Torretta were abducted Sept. 7 in a bold raid on the Baghdad office of their aid agency "Un Ponte Per ..." ("A Bridge To ..."). Two Iraqis, Raad Ali Aziz and Mahnaz Bassam, were also seized; they too were released Tuesday.

News of the release came after a Muslim leader from Italy met with an influential Muslim association in Baghdad on Tuesday to press for their freedom, though it was not immediately known if there was a connection. The two women, both 29, had been working on school and water projects in Iraq.

The Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Rai al-Aam had reported Tuesday that they could be released by Friday in return for a $1 million ransom. But Al-Arabiya TV, citing unidentified sources involved in the negotiations, said no ransom was paid.

Pope John Paul II, who recently urged that all hostages held in Iraq be freed, expressed "great joy" over the release of the Italian aid workers, the Vatican said.

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi went before Parliament to announce their release.

"Finally a moment of joy," Berlusconi said, as the assembly broke into applause. "The two girls are well and will be able to return to their loved ones tonight."

Four Egyptian telecommunications workers abducted last week were also freed, their parent company, Orascom, announced in Cairo. One of the Egyptians was released Monday and the rest on Tuesday, said the company. Two other Egyptian employees remain in captivity.

The Egyptian charge d'affaires in Baghdad, Farouq Mabrouk, said the kidnappings were "motivated by financial reasons." But an Orascom spokesman declined to comment on whether a ransom had been paid.

Family members embrace after they were freed from being held hostage by Iraqi insurgents.

More than 140 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq — some by anti-U.S. insurgents and others by criminals seeking ransom. At least 26 have been killed, including two Americans whose beheadings were recorded on grisly video footage and posted on the Internet last week.

A Western official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said this week's back-to-back releases raised hopes for those still in captivity, including British hostage Kenneth Bigley, who was captured with the Americans from their Baghdad house on Sept. 16. But with so many different groups involved in the kidnappings, the diplomat cautioned against drawing any conclusion.

A man identified as a French negotiator told Al-Arabiya that he has met two French journalists held hostage here for over a month and secured a promise for their release. He did not give a time frame, and said there was no demand for ransom.

Negotiators were also able to secure a promise from the kidnappers "to make an audiotape in which they announce the imminent release of the two," said the man, identified by the station as Philippe Brett.

A French foreign ministry spokesman in Paris, speaking on condition of anonymity, said: "We do not have any knowledge of the accord mentioned on Al-Arabiya."

In a statement e-mailed to The Associated Press in Cairo and also posted on a discussion board of the Iraq Islamic Army, the kidnappers of the journalists praised France's "positive steps toward the Iraqi people," a sign that the hostage-takers may be softening their anti-French position.

The group said it hoped "this is a beginning for a new era of understanding our issues and respect of our constants."

Meanwhile, dozens of masked gunmen carrying flags of Iraq's most feared terror group drove down the main street of the central city of Samarra in a show of strength Tuesday for the first time since U.S. troops briefly entered the central city this month under a deal brokered with tribal leaders.

The militants, loyal to terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, stopped some cars, asking the occupants to hand over music tapes in exchange for ones with recitations from the Muslim holy book, the Quran.

The city north of Baghdad has been under insurgent control and a virtual "no-go" area for U.S. troops since May 30.

Al-Zarqawi's Tawhid and Jihad group has claimed responsibility for a series of bombings and kidnappings, including those of Bigley and the two slain Americans, Eugene Armstrong and Jack Hensley. Intelligence reports indicate the al-Qaida-linked group has been forced to reorganize its leadership, the military said in a statement.

Four dead in high school shooting in Buenos Aires

By Bill Cormier
Associated Press

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — A high school student opened fire in a classroom in southern Argentina, killing four classmates and wounding five Tuesday in Argentina's worst school rampage on record, police said.

The 15-year-old suspect began his attack without uttering a word, letting go with intermittent bursts of gunfire from a 9-millimeter handgun as students cowered beneath their desks, authorities said.

The rampage at Islas Malvinas Middle School No. 2 in a remote southern corner of Buenos Aires province, touched off intense nationwide debate about spiraling school violence in Argentina, long considered one of South America's safer countries.

Stabbings and other attacks on teachers and students have recently alarmed educators and parents alike and Tuesday's gunfire triggered public soul-searching about the state of Argentina's classrooms.

"We heard gunfire and a lot of screaming and then everyone coming out into the hallway," said one boy on local television, who did not identify himself. "We saw three bodies on the ground with bullet wounds."

Authorities provided no immediate motive for the attack but said they were questioning the student, who was arrested soon after the attack on the classroom in Carmen de Patagones, some 610 miles south of Buenos Aires.

The suspect showed up around 7:30 a.m. before the teacher arrived, walked into a classroom, drew the gun from its holster and began firing indiscriminately at classmates, according to police.

Some students said it sounded like firecrackers going off, until they saw bloodied students screaming as they fled the room, according to local news agency Diarios y Noticias. One boy said the suspect terrified classmates as he took out the weapon and began shooting.

"Everyone hid underneath the desks and then he began firing," he told local Canal 7 television station.

After the shooting stopped, police said, two girls and a boy ranging from 14 to 16 were dead and a teenage girl was mortally wounded. Five others were injured, one in serious condition. Police said they arrested the suspected gunman without resistance soon afterward in the schoolyard.

Mario Oporto, education minister for vast Buenos Aires province that includes Carmen de Patagones, lamented the violence.

"This is a case of violence that has exceeded all bounds," Oporto said.

Reports of classroom violence have raised public concern in recent months and years even before the shooting, which is the worst on record.

In July, a 12-year-old schoolgirl was hospitalized after she was badly beaten, allegedly by classmates, at a school in La Plata southeast of Buenos Aires.

A 17-year-old student in central Cordoba was found stabbed, last November. In October 2003, a teacher in Mendoza, western Argentina, had her skull fractured by a tossed paving stone.

Before midday Tuesday, firefighters rolled three bodies out of the school in black plastic body bags. A shocked crowd milled outside amid the ambulances and police cars standing by.

Authorities said they had whisked the teenage suspect to a juvenile court center in Bahia Blanca, another city in southern Buenos Aires province. Officials said he would undergo psychiatric tests as part of the first stages of the investigation.

Cat Stevens says he was victim of 'unjust' treatment

LOS ANGELES — When he was yanked off a Washington-bound plane and sent home, the singer formerly known as Cat Stevens says he became the victim of an "unjust and arbitrary system" that is diminishing the United States' reputation as a defender of freedom.

In an opinion piece published in Tuesday's Los Angeles Times, Yusuf Islam said he and his 21-year-old daughter were on their way to Nashville last week to look into a music project when their flight from London was diverted to Bangor, Maine.

The captain told passengers "heavy traffic" was to blame, Islam said, but as soon as the plane touched the ground, a half-dozen uniformed men approached, asked his name and told him to come with them. He had turned up on a list of people suspected of having terrorist links.

"I was devastated," Islam wrote. "The unbelievable thing is that only two months earlier, I had been having meetings in Washington with top officials from the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives to talk about my charity work.

"Had I changed that much? No. Actually, it's the indiscriminate procedure of profiling that's changed," Islam wrote. "I am a victim of an unjust and arbitrary system, hastily imposed, that serves only to belittle America's image as a defender of the civil liberties that so many dearly struggled and died for over the centuries."

Since he converted to Islam in 1977, he said, there have been repeated efforts to link him to violent causes and groups.

"I denounce all forms of terrorism and injustice; it is simply outrageous for anyone to suggest otherwise," he said, noting he has spoken out against the Sept. 11 attacks and the taking of hostages in Iraq.

He has largely shunned music in recent years, although he did record a new version of his 1971 hit "Peace Train" last year for the album "Hope," which raised money for Iraqi children. Others participating in the project were Paul McCartney, David Bowie and Avril Lavigne.

Islam told ABC in an interview to be broadcast Friday on "20/20" that he has been a frequent U.S. visitor in recent years.

He said in his opinion piece that he was trying to keep this visit low-profile "because of the speculation it might have raised in the music world about a return of the Cat."

"Media attention was the last thing I wanted," he said. "But it seems God wanted otherwise."

Choice to postpone elections a good one

Amidst the turmoil and chaos of the latest Student Government Association scandal, senate elections were scheduled for today at each of the four Dining Commons as well as the Campus Center. There was much debate over whether or not these elections should even take place, and late last night, the SGA decided to postpone them, due to a total lack of preparation.

Typically, the Coordinating Council of the SGA meets over the summer to appoint a Chancellor of Elections who can begin to prepare for the fall semester. This step of the organizational effort is the responsibility of the Speaker of the Senate — in this case — Patrick Higgins.

This summer, the elections commission was not organized until the first day of school because the council was caught in an internal struggle over whether or not the ALANA caucus seats would remain in tact.

Aside from this setback, there is also the matter of the events of the past week. While the community holds its breath in anticipation of resignations from the nine individuals pictured in the scandalous photos, their names all remained on the ballots of today's would-be elections.

Because of these factors, it is unlikely that an election, whatever its outcome, would've be ratified by the Senate. If the elections were thrown out, there would have to be a special election held later in the semester before anyone's positions could be determined. If this sounds at all familiar, it's because it is exactly what happened last spring. Worst of all, this special election would be taking place at the expense of the students. More time, effort and money would have to go into determining which candidates would best serve the students as SGA senators.

Taking all of this into consideration, it was a good move on the part of the SGA and its coordinating council to postpone the elections. Unless the elections can be executed properly, holding them is simply not an option. Postponing the elections will save not only the students, but also the SGA itself, from being put through another ordeal like the one we all experienced last semester.

Elections have been scheduled for Wednesday of Thursday of next week, and hopefully by then they will be better prepared to handle them.

READERS RESPOND TO THE SGA

A DISPLAY OF 'MODERN' RACISM

As a Jew and an ALANA graduate student at UMass, I felt disgusted and angry by the behavior of Patrick Higgins, Brian Roberts, Tim Daly and their friends in the photographs published Monday. I wondered why they would possibly think their behavior was acceptable. Or did they just think no one would hold them accountable?

Reading The Massachusetts Daily Collegian story, "Higgins, SGA Under Fire," I gained some insight into Higgins' perspective. Yet, I'm no less disgusted or angry. I worry that Higgins may have a dangerously narrow view of white supremacy.

In response to students accusing him of "being a racist," Higgins said he and his friends were "making a joke about it," by drawing a picture of him as a Klansman. I imagine their logic was, "Students accuse me of being a racist. How absurd. Klansmen are racist, and I'm not a Klansman, so how could anyone accuse me of being a racist?"

But Klansman aren't the only White Supremacists. And not all White Supremacists wear pointy hats and burn crosses. Even David Duke, former Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, has changed tactics; Duke and other "modern racists" have suggested that White Supremacists put away their sheets and crosses and get involved in politics, use government to further promote White Supremacy.

A key point for "modern racism" is the denial that policies continue to privilege whites and oppress ALANA people. Is Patrick Higgins a Klansman? I doubt it, though I acknowledge the possibility. But Higgins has supported policies that I believe promote white students' dominance and ALANA students' marginalization in the SGA and at UMass. For example, Higgins has stated that he does not want to recognize ALANA Caucus seats in the SGA Senate, though he might "to avoid another year of fighting" (Daily Collegian, 9/23/04).

I'm greatly concerned that any SGA member or UMass student would advocate policies that disenfranchise ALANA students and then make light of their behavior by comparing it to more widely recognized White Supremacist behavior. Will Patrick Higgins, Tim Daly, Brian Roberts, and the others in the photos voluntarily resign, to make meaningful their "heartfelt" apologies? I hope so, but I doubt it. Abolitionist Frederick Douglass said, "Power concedes nothing without a demand."

OPEN LETTER TO THE UMASS STUDENT COMMUNITY

The pictures posted on a personal Web site which recently surfaced were taken the day before my first presidential election was thrown out. The pictures featured and were taken by the same people who led the charge to throw out the election

This discovery has attracted the attention of local media, angered and insulted the minority communities and elicited predictable damage control sounds such as "zero tolerance, stern discipline, and criminal charges" from the administration. Equally predictable was that it evoked a public apology and expression of regret from one of the "student leaders" responsible.

I have no doubt that these students genuinely regret and are embarrassed by the lapse of judgment and taste on their part — especially its public disclosure.

I would like to be able to accept the explanation that the drawing was no more than a drunken prank, a bad joke, a momentary lapse of judgment, and no more. It is hard enough to believe that even if one was totally inebriated and had poor taste, that one could imagine the Ku Klux Klan to be a matter of humor.

However, it is impossible to believe that the next morning, once sober, one would record the "joke" for posterity and circulation on a Web site. This suggests that the problem runs deeper. It would be regrettable for any student, but these are leaders of the Student Government who claim to represent the values and interests of this student body.

This is racism; we have grown and we have to extinguish it. These symbols are among other things, a rebuke and insult to the process of education and enlightenment to which our University is committed. But it is not the end of the world nor is it a capital crime.

Talk of dismissing students is both excessive and unhelpful, and can be counterproductive. It can lead us to believe we have done something, when all we have done is cut the symptom and left the root of racism untouched.

It would be far better to see this regrettable incident as an opportunity for education, community building, and administrative self-examination.

As President of the Student Government Association, I devote most of my time working with the student body and I can affirm that these attitudes do not represent the vast majority of students on this campus.

I have received only one letter of resignation. For the students involved who are not removing themselves from public office it becomes the responsibility of us, the students, to remove them.

There is another matter of great importance to consider. As President of the Student Government my duty is not only to represent the interest of students but also to affirm and protect the autonomy of the Student Government on campus. It will be a great mistake for us to allow the administration in an act of face saving and damage control to remove these students from publicly elected office.

Such action not only disempowers students, but also attempts to establish a very ominous precedent. It is patently not the business of the administration to determine who the student leadership should or should not be. It is our responsibility and right, and ours alone, to redeem the reputation of our community and the integrity of our Student Government by electing officers that represent the decency and sensitivity that I have observed in working with you all on campus.

It is time for some major house cleaning and it has to start with the SGA. The SGA must rid itself of an environment that perpetuates racism.

This is an opportunity for the administration to follow suit. And not by punishing and making scapegoats of these students but by looking at how the administration has contributed or been influenced by this mindset.

ALANA students have been trying to talk to the administration about a culture of creeping racism for a long time and have not been listened to. Perhaps the administration will hear a message coming from the entire student community. I call upon you all to send that message loudly and clearly with your vote on Wednseday and Thursday of next week, at the Dining Commons and Campus Center for senate elections.

Together we can reinvigorate Student Government on this campus and create a unified and effective instrument, which represents the true values and interests of the student community on campus.

Books are worth their cost

S.J. Port

Financing an education is an issue of tremendous concern for the majority of students. Add to that concern about the outrageous cost of books each semester and you begin to wonder whether that little piece of paper, which holds so much societal weight by declaring degree credentials, is worth the accrued credit card and loan debt.

Students begin to wonder if they need every book for every course, how hard it would be to share their books, and whether or not they should bother to buy a book they may not read anyway.

Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante and his colleagues have proposed a book-borrowing system to save the poor student from one burden of generally unbearable educational costs — fabulous. Except, what about the majors who enjoy reading?

Call me a nerd, but I get excited by the covers of books, the smell of books, the ideas in books, the power of understanding and owning books. Books evoke powerful emotions in me — when I pick up a weathered favorite, I remember a phase of my life.

As an English and political science double major, the majority of my time is spent reading and writing about readings. The syllabi for my courses contain classics, anthologies and political readings, the majority of which will be relevant for decades to come, but it is not just the humanities for which course books remain a valuable wing of one's personal library.

My father, a doctorate of mathematics, continually draws from his reserve of undergraduate and graduate level mathematical texts [from the 1960s and 70s] for discussions and impromptu lessons. Recently, he opened these archives to my brother, a mathematics and physics major at Worcester Polytechnic Institute, and his books continue to be useful 30 years after purchase.

The only books bought for courses that I have not kept for my personal library were textbooks for two required science-based general education courses. That said, admittedly, my subjects are not as time sensitive as the new or technology-based fields. It is these fields that perhaps would benefit from Bustamante's proposed rental-system.

The only books bought for courses that I have not kept for my personal library were textbooks for two required science-based general education courses.

However, for those of us in majors that often require books to be purchased from alternative sources — such as the myriad of small local bookstores — the additional cost applied to our student bills would actually create an added pecuniary stress. If this fee were optional, it is unlikely to raise the $800,000 that the University receives each year from Follet.

Besides unanswered questions regarding how much the proposal would actually save students, what shape the books would be in, what percentage of students this would benefit, how this would affect the library (really, isn't the foundation of a book-borrowing system rooted in a well-funded, updated, superb library collection?), there is momentous assumption that the University could dependably organize this effort!

The rental company would require students to use their UCards to access the rental-system, which would then access the student's SPIRE information to ensure that students purchase the correct textbooks.

This creates two new problems: the added stress to the miserably unreliable SPIRE system and the possible distribution of private student information (student identification and social security numbers as well as financial aid and administrative data) to the lending corporation. Since SPIRE can't handle the responsibilities it currently carries for the University, how can we tack on one more enormous burden and expect the University to function on any level?

Furthermore, as our University struggles to stay in the black, the loss of Follet's $800,000 deposit to our budget (part of their contract, which in turn generates a $6 million-a-year revenue for their pockets) will hurt. Which University program will that 800,000 be cut from? Unless the rental-fee (which would have to be at least $100 per semester) were mandatory for all undergraduate students, it is unlikely this loss would be made up.

Bustamante wants students to be aware of options and potential savings, which is a great sensitivity in a leader, but why not suggest that students purchase textbooks online? The World Wide Web has provided a plethora of opportunities to save on books as well as sell used texts. Students who do not use the Internet to buy and sell should consider their book expenses as part of their educational cost. A simple budget-appeal on your financial aid form to include abnormally high textbook costs (easily proven through receipts) would up the amount students can borrow in loans — and sometimes even increase their opportunities for increased federal, University or private financial aid [non-loan aid].

The proposal inflicts upon an already beleaguered academia the notion that books are not worth buying.

There are high costs to higher education; unfortunately, a book-borrowing system is not the ultimate answer.

All classes are created equal

Andrew Merritt

One of the great virtues of the University of Massachusetts is that because of its considerable size, there is a wealth of opportunity for students and educators alike. However, one of the flaws of UMass' overall expanse is a general feeling of anonymity within the student body, that among the other 300 people in a lecture hall, you're not really very connected to your professor.

Perhaps that's the initial reason why I was so shocked and disappointed at what happened in my small class yesterday. The class, a high-level journalism class taught by one of the department's finest instructors, was small to begin with, at only five students. When two more dropped the class, we were left with a three-hour period of very intimate and interesting interaction with our professor.

In short, for anyone who has toiled away in Bartlett 65 or Mahar, my cozy four-way discussion (counting the professor) is a godsend — real contact with the instructor, and the ability to truly get your point across in a setting that isn't more befitting a summer movie than education.

However, while we were more than an hour into a film that related heavily to the class material, a constantly growing cluster of students began to mill around expectantly just outside the door. Though I noticed a few students peering into the classroom, I paid it no mind.

UMass Students are accustomed to being herded around, dealing with too many people on SPIRE network at once, and not being able to graduate on time because the required classes are too full with people who will eventually drop out anyway.

Minutes later, the door suddenly opened, and a well-dressed man walked in. He didn't introduce himself, and while there's no reason to post his name here, it took my professor's insistent asking to get him to say it. He loudly and incredulously asked, "There are only four people in this class?" as if we had broken a code of conduct by being so small.

"Yes," my professor answered, and after I got up to pause the film because it was clear that the man wasn't going to be cordial, he requested — nearly demanded — that we leave the room and find another space so that his class could move in. In retrospect, perhaps we should have put up more of a fight, but it was such a jarring series of events in the setting of a classroom that I believe we were all a little too taken aback to say anything.

Before I go on, I should clarify that this wasn't some rogue operation, a group of nomads just skirting the rules and finding their own place to be. In fact, the class had been bumped from their original room by what he described as a small number of people in a Judaic Studies class. Why he didn't barge in on them, I couldn't guess. So, the instructor and his merry band of learners took up residence in our room, the room we were assigned at the beginning of the semester.

It should also be noted that my class had been planning to make little use of the room for the rest of the semester. Because we are essentially just a small group of friends meeting for discussion once a week now, we've decided to start having class semi-regularly at a coffee shop. So it's not the intention of this writer to say that moving our small group out of a regular-size classroom in the Herter building was some sort of outrage — in fact, I suspect that none of us would have spoken a word of protest if we were asked to meet in an office or find another, smaller spot every week. No, this isn't about any insult I felt because I was forced to pack up my things and move to another room. We survived, and went next door where we finished the film, and our discussion of it.

My outrage (and that of my classmates) springs from the absolutely callous and offensive way we were treated by someone who is expected to hold some sort of dignified demeanor, at least within the university walls. We were rudely interrupted, talked over, and finally asked to leave a classroom we deserved to have, as if our learning experience was somehow lesser than his students'.

What's the point of my rant, you ask? Sure, the slighting done that day was only minor, and the 10 feet of hallway we had to traverse to complete our mission of watching a video for class wasn't exactly a daunting distance. We made it to the next room safely, and finished our video, before walking away in disgust.

It's not that I had to pack up my things and move, it's not that we had to briefly pause our movie. It's in the message sent by someone who should be sensitive to the issues of such a large school. UMass students are accustomed to being herded around, dealing with too many people on the SPIRE network at once, and not being able to graduate on time because the required classes are too full with people who will eventually drop out anyway. So it sends a frightening and disenchanting message when a professor, someone who has certainly dealt with some of UMass' ills firsthand, would be so cavalier in demanding a group of bright, driven students to discontinue their work so that his class could take over the room. Certainly, the fact that the professor's lecture was inadvertently bumped is a problem, and using our assigned room was understandable. But for him to treat us as if we were less important, simply because there were fewer of us speaks to every legitimate gripe students have about this school.

Rules for restaurants: Tips for better tipping

Thomas Naughton

Having been a server in various restaurants over the years, I have noticed some alarming and blatantly rude trends sweeping through the restaurant business. Restaurants of the Pioneer Valley must have quite the mixture of feelings concerning our return to the area, for the summers in Amherst are no doubt ghostly in comparison to the hopping school year.

However, some young people were never taught by their parents how to dine out politely, causing students to behave in ways that would make servers wish they had never come back at all. On one hand, I feel that any server in this area should have a bit more understanding considering the demographic they are serving — young students who are somewhat poor and extolling the virtues of newfound freedom out of the watchful eye of their parents.

On the other hand, this is not just a "student" issue; people in general do not understand the trials and tribulations of working at a restaurant. The general dining population with some exceptions is surly, rude, at times cheap, and on the whole not suited for eating in public. To remedy this situation, I offer you New Rules for Restaurants, and why they should be implemented. I hope that by doing this, server and guest alike can unite in the sheer pleasure of what brought them together in the first place: food.

Under-tipping a server who is a crabby jerk is not the answer to bad service. You are giving this mean person more reason to be mean and horrible.

Rule #1. If you cannot afford to tip your server at least 20 percent of your total bill, you cannot afford to dine out, period.

Why: In Massachusetts, the server's wage is $2.63 per hour. Yes, that wage is hourly, not by the minute. Tipping your server 20 percent of your total bill is not a gift for excellent, backbreaking service — it's the lowest common denominator. Say for instance you meet Sally, a server at the local feedbag. You and your friend eat dinner and your bill comes to roughly $18.00. You tip Sally $3.60 (20 percent) because you are not stupid, and Sally did her job. You were Sally's only table that hour. That means that Sally made $6.23 in that hour. Sweatshop workers in Cambodia make more than that (not really, but it's not far off). It's not your fault though, you tipped 20 percent; you did the right thing.

However, let's look upon 20 percent not as the maximum amount you can tip the way Americans seem to believe, but as a jumping-off point. I know, you're thinking "that's crazy," but keep reading and I might persuade you. Sally made $6.23 that hour that you were in her care, which really sucks, huh? Imagine that Sally is your best friend, or girlfriend, or sister, or mother, or mother of your child. Would you want that person in your life to be making that little money per hour? I doubt it. Entertain this tipping scheme for a moment, keeping in mind the aforementioned special person in your life who made $6.00.

If your server does their job, in that they get your food, drinks and check out in a quick and neat fashion, they don't swear at you or spill hot soup on you purposefully, and they are at least courteous, you should always tip 20 percent.

If your server does the above and they are funny, nice, caring, approachable, good conversation, mindful of your children and their needs, and if they are honest with you about what tastes the best and is the best value, you should absolutely tip more.

I'm not talking 50 percent but even 22 percent would make a difference. Servers work 13-hour shifts sometimes with people breathing down their necks, angry about food, beverage and the world. If your server can stay positive and competent, they surely deserve more than $3.60 on an $18.00 bill.

Under-tipping a server who is a crabby jerk is not the answer to bad service. You are giving this mean person more reason to be mean and horrible. Tip the server 15 percent at least (think: minimum wage) and always speak to a manager. That is the only way the server will be corrected or fired. No server will ever say "Gee, that last table didn't tip me well or at all, maybe I should take some Lithium, suck it up, and be nice." More often than not, an un-tipped server will continue to suck if not sink to new lows.

Under-tipping a server for a long wait on your food, or food mistakes when a server honestly rang the item in correctly is unacceptable. There are often three servers to one grill cook, and those servers often have at least two orders to place at one time. That's a lot of orders for one person; people are bound to make mistakes, and orders are bound to take longer than McDonald's. Taking this out on your server is wrong.

As a last note on tipping, more often than not, you will not be the only table that a server has in one hour, but this does not let you out of the above tipping scheme. Most restaurants are corporate and do not allow servers to have more than three or four tables at a given time. If you take that information as reason to tip below 20 percent, we're back to square one with three tables giving Sally $1 or $2 tips. Those tips combined with her wages still don't equal what those idiots at Coach make for organizing expensive bags while looking bored.

The best way to think about tipping is this: you're paying for a service; if you go to a hardware store and buy a hammer, you can't decide if you will pay full price for the hammer based on how nice the clerk at the register is. Sure, the tip is not included in the price of a meal, but in order to ensure good service for you and others in the future, pay it forward, and pay it well.

Eat your heart out

Bob McGovern

This summer, I attended my first WNBA basketball game and left with insight into a world very few of us take the time to examine.

It was an experience as exciting as watching paint dry, in slow motion. As the New York Liberty and the Washington Mystics made their way to the Madison Square Garden locker rooms at halftime, I started to wonder if the mind-numbing action could possibly get any worse.

Then came "The Black Widow."

For the halftime show there was a Chicken McNugget eating contest, between three seemingly normal people. There was a generic fat man named "Beautiful" Brian Sieken, one Joe Shmoe with face paint to the tune of the late wrestling great, The Ultimate Warrior, and Sonya Thomas known by her fans as "The Black Widow."

It turns out that, not only does Thomas have her own Web site, but she has a fan site and belongs to a league of "athletes" who share her abnormal eating habits.

At first glance there didn't seem to be much competition. Sieken was huge, I mean really huge. The McNuggets didn't seem to stand a chance against a man of his girth. It was then that I realized how this small Korean woman earned her name.

Weighing no more than 110 pounds, Thomas dominated the men. As the five-minute clock ticked away, it became increasingly obvious that she wasn't just some freelance eater; she was something different.

There was something professional about the way she ate, something that I've never witnessed.

Thomas ate 80 McNuggets in five minutes.

The crowd went ballistic as the announcer handed her the McNugget championship belt. It was unbelievable. Sieken didn't even come close, and neither did the other guy. She stared at the crowd with a, "you're damn right I just did that," look and washed the feast down with a couple sips of water.

When I went home that night, I immediately went onto the internet and plugged in her name, hoping with a shot in the dark I would uncover her mystery. Low and behold, it was easier than I could have imagined.

It turns out that, not only does Thomas have her own website, but she has a fan site and belongs to a league of "athletes" who share her abnormal eating habits. It is the International Federation of Competitive Eating (IFOCE), a group that embraces the competitive nature of forced gluttony.

Delving deeper into this emerging "athletic" group, I discovered that, much like any other sport, there is a type of hierarchy depending upon the amount of victories in various events. Thomas is hands down the top female eater in the world and exhibited that she is one of the top in the world on the IFOCE's biggest stage: The Nathan's Hot Dog Dogfest.

Thomas came in third in the event, eating 32 dogs (buns and all), to break her own female/American record of the previous year. Although this number is astounding, it can't hold a flame to the main figurehead of the IFOCE, a Japanese man by the name of Takeru Kobayashi.

Kobayashi, affectionately known as "Kobe," has won Dogfest the past four years. He has beaten men two times his size, and this year he put down a grand total of 53.5 dogs in 12 minutes.

Although this event is one of the few that is recognized by the public eye, there are dozens of events that span across many different kinds of calorie-pumping foods.

Each food has a specialist and each specialist has a record that is as intimidating as any record in contemporary athletics. Men like Crazy Legs Conti, who ate 5 1/2 pounds of buffet food in 12 minutes, make up this list and headline the IFOCE circuit.

Now I wouldn't call what these extreme eaters do a sport, but their stomach-widening performances are still intimidating in their own right.

On the IFOCE website, there is a link that says "Join as an eater," where web-surfers can put in their information in hopes of becoming a professional eater.

I looked at the form and decided, "What the hell," and threw my name out there. Part of the form asks to list your food specialty. I tried to think of something that, if push came to shove, I could potentially digest in a large quantity.

After some thought, I figured out the one food that could potentially put me on the map of competitive overindulgence.

Yes sir, give me some Jelly Beans.

In defense of Nader

Mike Sances

I could write an entire column on why I feel Ralph Nader is the best choice for the nation — the candidate who would best represent the interests of the American people while in the White House. But it would likely be skipped over by most readers, the typical reaction to the mere idea of Nader running being one of studied narrow-mindedness, a hostile pragmatism based on the tired cliché that "a vote for Nader is a vote for Bush." In light of the circumstances, then, I realize that any endorsement of the independent should come only after I have dispelled the "spoiler" mythology, re-legitimizing what would normally be seen as a citizen's inalienable right to pursue political office.

Since announcing his candidacy in February, Nader has been the victim of a frenzy of attacks, some of them outright slanderous, but all seeming to center on the idea that Nader caused Al Gore to lose in 2000. Indeed, so effusive has this criticism been that it's impossible to find press coverage of the independent untainted by the word "spoiler."

Now, Democrats are entitled to say what they will, and one can certainly understand their zeal in attempting to dethrone the incumbent. After all, according to the conventional wisdom, the former Green Party candidate cost Gore essential votes in two hotly contested states four years ago.

Or did he? The problem with this logic, though admittedly straightforward, is that it omits the important fact that over seven million registered Democrats voted for Bush in 2000. Of those, two hundred and fifty thousand were cast in the state of Florida, according to www.votenader.org. For anyone interested in arithmetic, these figures far exceed the number of Nader voters who claimed in 2000 exit polls that Al Gore was their second choice. Taking things a step further, we are also forced to conclude that the Democrats failed miserably four years ago by losing so many voters to the other side.

There are some very serious institutional problems in this country that are stifling change in mainstream politics. Put simply, if we try to collar independent reformers like Nader, how are these problems ever going to get discussed, let alone solved?

Pragmatism can often lead to this sort of tunnel vision. It can also lead to hypocrisy: in particular, the puzzling fact that the same people who blame Ralph Nader for their loss in 2000 are also quite fond of claiming that they actually did win the election, but that it was stolen from them by George Bush, the Supreme Court, racist GOP tactics in Florida, or whatever; as long as they can avoid blaming themselves.

Having dealt with the spoiler myth, I'll now point out that in my opinion, whether or not Nader did steal crucial votes from Gore in 2000 is actually irrelevant — call me old-fashioned, but I just don't feel that it's our place to tell anyone they should give up one of their fundamental rights, then throw a coordinated tantrum when they refuse. Indeed, so absurd is this notion of attacking one's right to run for office that it apparently doesn't even merit serious recognition. In a televised exchange this summer between Nader and former Vermont Governor Howard Dean, the official topic of discussion was alleged to be "the role of third parties in American politics."

Needless to say, 90 percent of the debate consisted of Dean's vacuous and repetitive urgings for Nader to quit the race, contrasted with the independent's eloquent and persuasive rebuttals. When asked by the moderator whether he was in favor of abolishing the Electoral College, something most political science undergrads probably have an opinion on, Dean was caught off guard, sputtering that he wasn't prepared to answer, having never given the matter any serious thought.

Nader replied in the affirmative, proceeding to offer several reasons in support of his position.

This leads us to another important point. Half the eligible voters four years ago chose not to vote, and those who did vote were so bored with the respective candidates that they could barely choose between the lesser of two evils. Clearly, Americans are desperate for fresh ideas, for real change. There are some very serious institutional problems in this country that are stifling change in mainstream politics. Put simply, if we try to collar independent reformers like Nader, how are these problems ever going to get discussed, let alone solved?

Now that we're back in reality, where facts matter and democratic rights are recognized on a more than selective basis, I suppose I might close by telling you outright whom I think you should vote for. But in the spirit of self-determination, I'll let you decide that for yourself. We should resist having our minds made up for us, not only by supporters of particular candidates, but by those who are now telling us that the coming election is too important for principles. Even if that's true, and tactical voting proves necessary, the choice remains a personal one — not something to be decided by mere slogans.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

"V" is for voting

Lisa McLaughlin

In a recent performance I saw at the Mullins Center, comedian Lewis Black emphasized to UMass students the importance of voting in the upcoming presidential election. He lamented that for most Americans, this is always an awful, degrading experience, because we have to choose between two candidates that are (what he deemed) "sh*t, and sh*ttier." He went on to say, "I don't know about you, but I'm voting for sh*t!"

Black and his colleagues are always using their droll perspectives to look at the very unfunny world of politics, which for many college students can make the normal lassitude of CNN turn into a series of comedy sketches on Saturday Night Live. I will attempt to use this humor to my advantage (and your interest) when dealing with "blah" yet important subjects.

Now I want to seriously talk about a special "P" word that gets thrown around a lot these days. It's not priest, it's not peace, and no, it's not potato. Survey says ... it's patriotism. Let me tell you ... I have been called unpatriotic for not supporting the war in Iraq. I have been called unpatriotic for protesting against government decisions I find unethical. I might as well be called unpatriotic for not hanging an American flag in my bedroom window, with a huge "Support Our Troops!" sign screaming right beside it. Because obviously, if I don't do that, then I don't have enough love for America.

According to the US Census Bureau, the voter turnout for the 2000 presidential election was a pathetic 60 percent of the citizen voter-age population.

America has different forms of patriotism, because we're a nation based on the individual. Among countless other things, my individualized idea of patriotism is in exercising my right to protest, serve on a jury, and most importantly, participate in electing my representatives.

The sense of apathy in this country really makes me want to throw things and cuss like a sailor! According to the U.S Census Bureau, the voter turnout for the 2000 presidential election was a pathetic 60 percent of the citizen voter-age population. Hello?! All of my fellow college students know what that percentage gets you in a class you need to graduate: A big, fat "D," which is barely escaping the horror and shame of having an "F" on your transcript. If that is going to happen, you might as well try to withdraw and get a "W" (not standing for you-know-who) instead, right? So people who fail to complete the voting process should just leave the country!

Oh, now you're paying attention!. I'm not going to expect you to take what I just wrote seriously. So you can put your assault rifles, ninja stars, and ultimate Frisbees down, and try to hear me out. By not registering to vote, and/or being registered to vote and not going to the polls people are telling me this:

-I don't care about my personal healthcare decisions or the cost of the prescription drugs that enable me to live.

-I don't care about my brother/sister, son/daughter, cousin or best friend who will have to go halfway around the world to fight in a war. I don't care about the training they will need or the equipment they will use. I could not care less about whether or not their equipment is the most up-to-date and safest available.

-I don't care about education, particularly public education (a reminder that most people reading this newspaper attend or have attended a public institution).

-I don't care about the rate of unemployment, and the likelihood of not being able to get a real job when I graduate.

-I don't care about freedom of speech. I believe that the government has the right to monitor everything that I do, to punish me for holding certain opinions, and to silence me through means of imprisonment or execution.

Since the presidential election is terrifyingly close, I feel compelled to use it as an example. Let it be known that I am not only encouraging you to vote on November 2nd, but to go to the polls faithfully to vote for your city/town officials, representatives, congresswomen/men, senators, etc. While your voice makes the most difference in the local sphere, it can also make a difference at the national level, even if it seems like only a small difference.

I do not endorse any candidate. Vote for Kerry. Vote for Bush. Vote for Nader. Write in Al Sharpton, or one of your best friends who you think can do the job right. Write in Mr. Potatohead for all I care. Just make sure you vote!

Northampton's Stephen Kellogg and The Sixers play UMass

Stephen Kellogg and The Sixers
Tonight
Student Union Ballroom
7:30

Bill Cosby, The Pixies and... Stephen Kellogg?

The list of University of Massachusetts alumni returning to campus to perform this semester just got longer.

Former UMass alum Stephen Kellogg will take over the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 7 p.m. Appearing with his band, The Sixers, the University Productions and Concerts sponsored show, will also feature under-the-radar opener Rich Price.

Tall, thin and shaggy-haired, Stephen Kellogg looks the part of ex-UMasser, current Northamptonite and dedicated musician. The Connecticut native moved up to Amherst as a college freshman and after graduation was drawn to the musical and artistic scene that Northampton had to offer. While attending the University, Kellogg lived in both the Northeast and Central residential areas.
